EXPLANATION

OF THE MARKS AND ABBREVIATIONS MADE USE OF IN THIS DICTIONARY, AND OF THE PLAN OF THE WORK.

1. THE asterisk (*), annexed to a word, denotes that it is not to be found in Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, but that it has been added by Mr. Todd.

2. The section (§), annexed to a word, indicates that it is distinguished, by Dr. Johnson or Mr. Todd, as a primitive word, by being printed, in the large Dictionary, in larger letters than the other words, which are regarded as derivatives. 56

3. The obelisk (†), annexed to a word, denotes that it is not to be found in the collection of either Dr. Johnson or Mr. Todd, but that it has been taken from Mr. Walker's Dictionary.

4. Ob. J., placed at the end of the definition of a word, denotes that the word is declared by Dr. Johnson to be obsolete, or not in use.

5. Ob. T. is used in the same manner as the above, with regard to all that portion of the words added by Mr. Todd, which he pronounces to be obsolete, or not in use.

6. Mr. Chalmers's Abridgement of Mr. Todd's edition of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary is given entire, with occasional additions from Johnson and Todd.

7. The pronunciation of all the words found in Walker's Critical Pronouncing Dictionary, is given as it stands in that work.

8. The pronunciation of the words which are not found in Walker's Dictionary, and which comprise almost all those to which an asterisk is annexed, and a considerable number of the others, has been added by the Editor, according to Walker's Principles, so far as those Principles could be applied.

9. Walker's Principles of English Pronunciation, and his Remarks on the pronunciation of particular words, are given entire. These Remarks are preceded by a ¶, and followed by a W.

10. In the alphabetical arrangement of words, the letter I (initial) has been separated from J, and the letter U from V.

11. Walker's Key to the Classical Pronunciation of Greek, Latin, and Scripture Proper Names, is printed in full.

N. B. In Mr. Chalmers's Abridgement, the words added by Mr. Todd, and the primitive words, are not distinguished from the rest; the words pronounced obsolete by Dr. Johnson and Mr. Todd, are not generally thus noted; and the words beginning with I and U are not separated, in the alphabetical series, from those beginning with J and V; but these improvements have all been introduced into this edition of the Dictionary.

ENGLISH DICTIONARIES,

Boston Stereotype Edition.

THE EDITOR'S PREFACE.

TO Dr. Johnson is universally conceded the first rank among English lexicographers ; and to Mr. Walker is assigned a similar rank among English orthoëpists. The Dictionary, which is now offered to the public, is founded upon the great work of Johnson, corrected and enlarged by Mr. Todd ; and it embraces, also, the entire labours of Walker on the pronunciation of the language. It has been formed on such a plan as to comprise all the most important materials, and to answer all the essential uses, of a Dictionary for understanding, writing, and speaking the English language ; and, at the same time, to enable the reader to see, as far as possible, on whose authority every thing rests. By the preceding explanations, one may not only have a general understanding of the plan of the work, but also form an idea of the nature and extent of the duty and responsibility of the Editor. Some further remarks, however, on the different parts of the volume, may not be useless.

In this connexion, it will not be improper to insert the titles of the several works (with the exception of that of Walker's Key, which stands in its proper place), on which this Dictionary is founded ; as by these the reader will see what the authors proposed to accomplish.

Title of Todd's (second) Edition of Johnson :—"A DICTIONARY of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE : in which the Words are deduced from their Originals ; and illustrated in their different Significations, by Examples from the best Writers. together with a History of the Language, and an English Grammar : by SAMUEL JOHNSON, LL. D. :—with numerous Corrections, and with the Addition of several thousand Words, as also with Additions to the History of the Language and to the Grammar : by the Rev. H. J. TODD, M. A., F. S. A., and M. R. S. L., Chaplain in ordinary to his Majesty, and Rector of Settrington, County of York."

Title of Chalmers's Abridgement :—"A DICTIONARY of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE : in which the Words are deduced from their Originals, explained in their different Meanings, and authorized by the Names of the Writers in whose Works they are found : by SAMUEL JOHNSON, LL. D. :—abridged from the Rev. H. J. TODD's corrected and enlarged [first] quarto Edition : by ALEXANDER CHALMERS, F. S. A."

Title of Walker's Dictionary :—"A CRITICAL PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY, and Expositor of the English Language : in which not only the Meaning of every Word is clearly explained, and the Sound of every Syllable distinctly shown, but, where Words are subject to different Pronunciations, the Authorities of our best Pronouncing Dictionaries are fully exhibited, the Reasons for each are at large displayed, and the preferable Pronunciation is pointed out : to which are prefixed, PRINCIPLES OF ENGLISH PRONUNCIATION : in which the Sounds of Letters, Syllables, and Words, are critically investigated, and systematically arranged ; the Influence of the Greek and Latin Accent and Quantity on the Accent and Quantity of the English, is thoroughly examined, and clearly defined ; and the Analogies of the Language are so fully shown as to lay the Foundation of a consistent and rational Pronunciation : like wise, Rules to be observed by the Natives of Scotland, Ireland, and London for avoiding their respective Peculiarities ; and Directions to Foreigners for acquiring a Knowledge of the Use of this Dictionary: the whole interspersed with Observations, Etymological, Critical, and Grammatical: by JOHN WALKER, Author of Elements of Elocution, Rhyming Dictionary, &c. &c."

Dr. Johnson's large Dictionary was first published in 1755. During the space of upwards of seventy years, which have since passed away, the English language has undergone considerable change; and if, to use the words of the great lexicographer, "no dictionary of a living tongue can ever be perfect, since, while it is hastening to publication, some words are budding, and some falling away," his work must necessarily display the language more imperfectly now, than at the time of its first appearance. He observes, that he "fixed Sidney's work" (Sir Philip Sidney, who died in 1586) "for the boundary, beyond which he made few excursions." But the earlier English authors have of late excited so much attention, as to render a glossary of their productions desirable. Mr. Todd has, accordingly, undertaken to adapt the Dictionary to the present taste with regard to English literature, by inserting the words found in the old, and heretofore neglected, writers; and also to the present state of the language, by adding such words as have come into use since the first publication of the work. By turning over the pages of this volume, and observing the words which are marked as added by Mr. Todd, one will readily perceive that a dictionary, which was destitute of all such, would be extremely defective. But on the labours of Mr. Todd, which indicate very extensive reading, especially as it regards the early English writers, it is unnecessary to enlarge, as his own account of them is presented to the reader.

The following notice is prefixed to Mr. Chalmers's Abridgement:—"This volume contains every word in Mr. Todd's edition of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary; and above fourteen thousand more than were given in Dr. Johnson's Abridgement. The whole forms the most extensive vocabulary ever published, and, in consequence of the additions introduced by Mr. Todd, it becomes a complete glossary of the early English writers." Mr. Chalmers's work was formed from Mr. Todd's first edition. His second edition, which was published in February, 1827, contains nearly a thousand additional words, and was received in season to have these inserted in the Appendix of this Dictionary. These, together with the other words newly added, increase the excess above the number of words in Dr. Johnson's Abridgement to upwards of fifteen thousand.

Dr. Johnson's Preface to his large Dictionary, Mr. Todd's Advertisements and Introduction, and Walker's Preface, together with all his introductory matter, as well as his Principles of English Pronunciation, are inserted in full; as it was thought the work would be rendered less satisfactory by the omission of any part of them.

The Dictionary, properly so called, comprising the vocabulary of words, with their definitions, &c., is formed chiefly by a union of Mr. Chalmers's Abridgement and Walker's Pronouncing Dictionary; but with the omission of Walker's definitions, except with regard to those words in his Dictionary (not much exceeding one hundred in number), which are not found in Mr. Todd's edition of Johnson. In many instances, in which the Editor has observed the omission by Mr. Chalmers of something particularly important, he has extracted from Dr. Johnson or Mr. Todd additional matter or remarks, etymological, explanatory, or critical.

To the words contained in this Dictionary, which are not found in Walker's, the pronunciation has been added, according to Walker's Principles, so far as those Principles could be applied; and this was easily done, with respect to most of them. A considerable number, however, some of them words now out of use, others local or provincial, and rarely found in books, and others from foreign languages, and not anglicised, presented more or less difficulty. Respecting those words, with regard to which Walker's method failed to furnish him with a guide, the Editor has availed himself of such other aids as he could obtain ; but some words he has left unpronounced, and with respect to some, to which he has added the pronunciation, he may have fallen into error : he hopes, however, the instances will not be found numerous or important.

With respect to many words of doubtful pronunciation, or concerning which orthoëpists differ, and particularly those respecting which Walker has omitted to exhibit this difference, the Editor has introduced the pronunciation of others, with the names of the authorities, enclosed in brackets ; yet, in all cases, making use of Walker's method of notation. By this means, the Dictionary has been rendered more satisfactory ; as, in all doubtful cases, it must be agreeable to those who consult it, to see the different modes of different orthoëpists ; and, in some instances, most persons will probably prefer the pronunciation of some other, to that of Walker. When the name of Perry is introduced, reference is always had to his "Synonymous, Etymological, and Pronouncing English Dictionary," in royal 8vo, which was first published in 1805, and which differs, in the pronunciation of many words, from Perry's "Royal Standard English Dictionary." The latter work, which is often referred to by Walker, has heretofore had a very extensive circulation in this country, and has been of great influence in fixing the prevailing pronunciation, especially in the Northern States. But the larger work of Perry, which is little known among us, and which does not appear to have been at all used by Walker, is found to agree with him in many cases, in which the other differs from him.

The Appendix contains all the words newly added by Mr. Todd in his second edition ; a number of words, that are found in the body of the Dictionary, here repeated for the sake of some correction or remark ; a few words of unquestionable authority, which were omitted by Dr. Johnson and Mr. Todd ; and some words which are more or less used in America. The Editor, however, has not undertaken to supply all the authorized English words, which are omitted, nor to remark upon all that are imperfectly exhibited, in the Dictionary ; but he has noticed such only as readily occurred to him, without any extended research. There are some words, which have grown out of our peculiar institutions and local circumstances, and some new uses of authorized English words, which are not to be condemned ; but there are other new words, which have sprung up among us, and new applications of old ones, which deserve no countenance. The number of Americanisms, however, which are properly so called, is not great. Some words, which have been so considered, are to be found in the writings of Englishmen, as well as Americans ; and many others had their origin in Great Britain, and are still known in some parts of that country as provincialisms, though they are not often found in books.

In preparing the Appendix, the Editor has made a free use of the Vocabulary of Americanisms, by his learned and respected friend, Mr. Pickering, who furnished him with his interleaved copy, containing much useful information in manuscript ; but who has been obliged, on account of his professional engagements, to decline rendering those further services, which were hoped from him, in regard to this part of the work. He has also been permitted to use an interleaved copy of the same Vocabulary, belonging to the Rev. Dr. Porter of Andover, from which he obtained some valuable materials. To Mr. Pickering's work, which was published in 1816, and which has had a salutary influence on our literature, by calling the attention of our scholars to the occasional deviations of American writers from pure English, a reference is always given, in noticing such words as are found in it. In many cases, however, in which a reference is made, the information here given is not wholly taken from that volume ; though, on most of the articles, it contains much more than could be properly admitted here. As many of the words in Mr. Pickering's book are now to be found among the additions of Mr. Todd, there was no occasion to insert such, except in a few instances, in the Appendix. Reference has also been made to Mr. Webster's Dictionary (published in 1806), with regard to such of the words as are found in that work, from which the definitions of them have also been partly taken. The plan of this Dictionary precluded the Editor from going into any discussion of doubtful or disputed topics ; yet, concise and imperfect as the Appendix is, he hopes it will not be found entirely useless.

Care has been taken to present a corrected edition of Walker's Key. Many errors and inconsistencies have been detected in the different English and American editions which have been examined ; and in some instances, it has been difficult to ascertain what was the real pronunciation intended by the author. The Key has been improved by exhibiting the variations of Perry and of Fulton and Knight, with regard to Scripture Proper Names. Though Walker may be regarded, in most cases, as the highest single authority, yet there are instances, in which the pronunciation of the others may be esteemed preferable ; and it may also be satisfactory to the American reader to know, that, with regard to nearly all the words not contained in the lists of the variations of Perry and of Fulton and Knight, their pronunciation coincides with his.

The List of Authors, with the reigns in which they flourished (which is abridged from that of Mr. Todd, yet containing all the names that he enumerates), will not be without benefit to many who may make use of the Dictionary, as it will, in various cases, afford assistance in determining the authority of words, and whether they are of long standing, or of recent introduction into the language. Many of the words added by Mr. Todd are taken from Provincial Glossaries, and many are derived from the early English writers. Of the latter, many more are now entirely obsolete than are so noted by him ; and the reader, on finding no other than an old writer quoted as an authority for an uncommon word, will naturally conclude that it is not now in use.

In this Dictionary the orthography of Dr. Johnson and Mr. Todd remains unaltered, with the exception of a few instances hereafter mentioned. " Dr. Johnson's Dictionary," says Mr. Nares, " has nearly fixed the external form of our language." Before the publication of that work, the orthography of the English language was very unsettled ; and even now, there are many words, with regard to which it is far from being uniform. Some of the principal varieties are those which relate to the use of k at the end of words of more than one syllable, when preceded by c ; as, critick or critic, publick or public ; and the u in the last syllable of such words as favour, honour, &c.

The final k is retained in all the editions, both of Johnson's large Dictionary, and his Abridgement. It is also found in most of the dictionaries that were published before that of Johnson ;—in Minsheu's (Spanish and English) ; in Cotgrave's (French and English) ; in Sherwood's (English and French) ; in Holyoke's (Latin and English) ; in Gouldman's (Latin and English) ; in Littleton's (Latin and English) ; in Boyer's (French and English) ; and in the English Dictionaries of Coles, Phillips, and Bailey : but on the other hand, it is omitted in Ainsworth's Dictionary (Latin and English, folio edition of 1752.) Of the dictionaries which have been published since Johnson's, it is retained in Sheridan's, Walker's, and Jones's ; also in Kenrick's, in substantives, but omitted in adjectives. Of the English dictionaries which have appeared since the first publication of Johnson's, the following, namely, Fenning's, Entick's, Bar- clay's, Ash's, Dyche's, Scott's, Perry's, and Fulton and Knight's, omit the k, and it is likewise omitted in the popular English spelling books. Walker remarks, that its "omission is too general to be counteracted, even by the authority of Johnson." The general usage, both in England and America, is, at present, so strongly in favour of its omission, that the retaining of it seems now to savour of affectation or singularity.

The omission of the u, in words ending with the syllable our, or or, is much less common than that of the final k. It is uniformly retained in all the dictionaries above enumerated, with the exception of Entick's and Ash's, in one class of words; as, favour, honour, &c.: though it is omitted in most of them in another class of words; as, inferior, superior, horror, terror, &c.

Although Mr. Todd has not made any considerable changes in the orthography of Johnson, yet he has altered the spelling in a number of instances. The words abridgement, acknowledgement, and judgement, Johnson writes without the silent e in the penultimate syllable, though he writes lodgement with it. In all these words, Mr. Todd inserts the silent e. The inconsistencies with regard to the orthography of the following words, as they are found in Johnson, have been removed by Mr. Todd:—namely, moveable, moveableness, unremoveable, unremoveably, immovable, immovably, removable; docile, indocil; chastely, chastness. In the word movable, and its derivatives, Mr. Todd omits the e in the antepenultimate syllable, and he writes indocile and chasteness.

But there are other inconsistencies, equally obvious, which Mr. Todd has suffered to remain unaltered; as may be seen in the following words:—ache, toothache, headach; ambergris, verdigrise; anteriour, posterior; interiour, exterior; apprized, unapprised; bias, unbiass; bigoted, unbigotted; brier, sweetbriar; burrow (a hole made by conies), conyborough; connexion, disconnection; contrrollable, uncontrollable. The words in Italics are conceived to be deviations from the right orthography, according to Johnson's principles, and they have been altered in this Dictionary. But there are some other inconsistencies, which have not been removed, as may be seen in the following words:—imbitter, disembitter; imbody, disembody; imbosom, disembosom; recall, miscal; waterfall, overfal; stanch, unstaunched.

There are several words which often appear, in the best modern publications, in a different orthography from that found in the dictionaries; among which are connexion, control, meager, and raindeer; which we often see written connection, controul, meagre, and reindeer. There is a great want of uniformity in the mode of writing the plural of those nouns, which, in the singular, end in ey; as, valley, valleys or vallies; attorney, attorneys or attornies, &c. The rule of Perry and of Murray, in such cases, is explicit:—"Nouns of the singular number," says the former, "ending in ey, require the addition of s only, for the formation of their plural; as, attorney, attorneys; chimney, chimneys." Johnson, in cases of this sort, is not always consistent; but, in this Dictionary, the orthography of such plurals has been made to conform to the rule here quoted. And, as a general principle, the orthography of words throughout the volume, has been rendered conformable to that which stands in the alphabetical series.

The first edition of Walker's "Critical Pronouncing Dictionary" was published in 1791; and the fourth edition (which was the last that was printed under his superintendence) was published in 1806. This is regarded as the best, and it has been made the standard, in editing the present work. Since the death of Walker, which took place in 1807, his Dictionary has passed through numerous editions in England; and it has also been stereotyped both in that country and in this.

Walker, in preparing his Dictionary, made pronunciation his principal object; and for this his work is chiefly valued. His explanations of words are professedly copied almost wholly from Johnson; but on the pronunciation of the English language, no other person, probably, ever bestowed so much attention. He studied the analogy of the language with care, and took great pains to ascertain the prevailing usage. His design was, as he expresses it, "principally to give a kind of history of pronunciation, and a register of its present state." The following remarks of his show what advantages he enjoyed for giving such a register:—"To a man born, as I was, within a few miles of the capital [London], living in the capital almost my whole life, and exercising myself there in public speaking for many years; to such a person, if to any one, the true pronunciation of the language must be very familiar." *

Sheridan's Dictionary, which was published in 1780, had considerable reputation; though it was universally acknowledged to have great defects; and it was superseded by that of Walker. The latter, however, has not been supplanted by any more recent work, but still maintains its popularity, and continues to undergo frequent reimpressions.

Since the publication of Walker's Dictionary, there have appeared in Great Britain two small Pronouncing Dictionaries, which have been favourably received; one by Stephen Jones, of London, and the other by G. Fulton and G. Knight, of Edinburgh. The authors of both these works have been much indebted to Walker, and do not withhold from him a tribute of commendation. Fulton and Knight observe, that "Sheridan and Walker, by their Dictionaries, have afforded the most effectual means of acquiring an accurate pronunciation." "On the useful invention of Mr. Sheridan," says Mr. Jones, "a valuable improvement had been made by the late Mr. Walker, whose Dictionary is a work of much labour and great merit."

But, though Walker holds the first rank as an orthoëpist, yet he ought not to be implicitly followed. The ultimate standard of pronunciation is not his mere authority, nor that of any other individual; but it is the usage of literary and wellbred society; and so far, and so far only, as his Dictionary is an accurate register of such usage, is it proper, according to his own principles, that it should be relied upon as a guide.

It may not be without use to make here some strictures on the real or supposed defects of Walker, and to exhibit a comparison, in a few points, between his system and those of others, who have preceded or followed him in the same department of literature. This comparison, together with the varieties exhibited in the Dictionary, with regard to words of doubtful or various pronunciation, will enable the reader to understand the most important points of difference among the most distinguished orthoëpists. It should be remembered, that, when these writers speak of the pronunciation of the language, and exhibit their systems of notation, they intend to give us that finished and exact pronunciation, which would be used in public speaking, and not the more lax and careless utterance, which is often heard in familiar conversation.

Walker has been thought to be too sparing in the use of his second, or Italian sound of a, as heard in far and father. In the following words, and their compounds, he pronounces a with its fourth sound, as in fat; but Nares and Jones give it the sound of a in father:—

* Walker's employment, as a teacher of elocution, was among the higher classes, and best educated people of England. The following testimony to his merit, from the great statesman and orator, Edmund Burke, is worthy of being recorded:—"One of the persons who particularly solicited Mr. Burke's exertions on this occasion, was Mr. (or, as he was commonly termed), Elocution Walker, author of the Pronouncing Dictionary, and other works of merit, and who had given lessons in the art to young Burke. * * * Mr. Burke, one day, in the vicinity of the House of Commons, introduced him to a nobleman, accidentally passing, with the following characteristic exordium:—'Here, my Lord Berkeley, is Mr. Walker, whom not to know, by name at least, would argue want of knowledge of the harmonies, cadences, and proprieties of our language.'"

With regard to moſt of the words in the preceding liſt, Perry agrees in his pronunciation with Nares and Jones. Fulton and Knight alſo agree with them, as it reſpects a conſiderable part ; but with regard to a portion of theſe words, they adopt an intermediate ſound of a, not ſo ſhort as a in fat, nor ſo broad as a in father.

Walker has been cenſured for not making a diſtinction, in his notation, between the ſound of a in bare, fare, hair, pair, &c., and in fate, pale, name, &c. This, however, is not a defect peculiar to Walker, but is common to him with other orthoëpiſts. No diſtinction is made in the ſound of a, in theſe words, by Kenrick, Sheridan, Nares, Jones, or Fulton and Knight ; and our countryman, Mr. Webster, in his Spelling Book, places them all under the firſt, or long ſound of a. There is, however, an obvious diſtinction in the ſound, as the words are pronounced in this country ; and the ſame diſtinction is ſaid to be preſerved in England ; and it was uſed by Walker himſelf, in his own pronunciation, if we may rely upon the teſtimony of one of his pupils. Whether theſe orthoëpiſts did not perceive the diſtinction, or whether, if they did perceive it, they did not think it ſufficiently important to recognise it in their notation, it may be difficult to aſcertain. Perry, however, in his “Synonymous, Etymological, and Pronouncing Dictionary,” has very properly made the diſtinction. The ſound of long a, as in fate, he marks thus, ā ; and the ſound of a in bare, thus, à ; and, generally, when the ſound of long a, or what is ſo conſidered by other orthoëpiſts, is followed by r, as in care, bear, fair, transparent, &c., he marks it in like manner, diſtinguiſhing it from long a, in fate, name, &c. It is not improbable, that all the other orthoëpiſts made the ſame diſtinction, in their practice, that Perry has made in his notation.

The manner in which the ſounds of the vowels are affected by being followed by the letter r, in words of one ſyllable, or in words of more than one ſyllable, when the following ſyllable begins with any other conſonant than r, has not always been ſufficiently attended to. Sheridan has not introduced, in any inſtance, what Walker designates as the ſecond ſound of a, as in far, and father, but marks a in far, par, cart, part, &c., with the ſame ſound as in hat, carry, parry, &c. : nor does Perry introduce what Walker marks as the third ſound of o, as in nor ; but he marks o in border and sordid with the ſame ſhort ſound as in borrow and sorrow ; and both he and Sheridan mark o in for and nor with the ſhort ſound, as in lot. There is an obvious difference in the ſound of u, as heard in cur, curb, fur, hurdle, &c., from its proper ſhort ſound in burrow, curry, furrow, duck, &c. ; but we do not know that this difference has been noticed by any orthoëpiſt.

With regard to the sound of oo, Walker remarks (Prin., No. 307), "It has a shorter sound, corresponding to the u in bull, in the words wool, wood, good, hood, foot, stood, understood, withstood; and these are the only words where this diphthong has this middle sound." This remark of Walker is doubtless erroneous, as this sound is given by common usage to the oo in several other words. Besides the words above enumerated, Perry and Jones give the same sound to oo in book, brook, cook, crook, hook, look, shook, and took. to these Perry adds hoop (for casks), and Jones adds soot and rook.

Walker's method of representing the sound of i and y, unaccented, by long e, has been considered, by Jones and some others, as a defect in his system. The objection here lies against the stress, rather than the quality of the sound. The last two syllables of the word affinity, as marked by different orthoëpists, will serve to indicate their respective methods of notation, with regard to the unaccented i and y:—

af-fin'-nè-tè, Walker :

af-fin'-î-ty, Perry :

af-fin'-ny-ty, Sheridan and Jones :

af-fin'-è-tè, Fulton and Knight.

These several authors doubtless intended that this word should be pronounced in precisely the same manner; and, whichever method may be deemed the most happy, no person is in danger of being misled by either.

Walker has been censured for inserting a slight sound of y before a, i, and y, in certain words; as, guard, guide, kind, marked gyârd, gyîde, kyind. The same method, however, is used by Sheridan, Jones, and Fulton and Knight; except that Sheridan omits the y in guard. It is difficult to represent the obscure softening here intended, by any notation; and it must be confessed that, by many speakers, it is carried to such excess as to have the appearance of gross affectation. It may be remarked, however, that the insertion of this sound is not a modern innovation. It was taken notice of by Steele, in his English Grammar, as long ago as the reign of Queen Anne, and was mentioned before that time by Ben Jonson. Among later writers, Dr. Beattie countenances it, and Mr. Nares condemns it. (See Prin., Nos. 92 and 160.)

The sound of ch, after l and n, Walker represents by sh; as, bench, branch, filch, pronounced bensh, bransh, filsh; and in this he is followed by Fulton and Knight. Sheridan and Jones, however, use tsh instead of sh; as, bentsh, brantsh, filtsch; but the difference of sound is very slight.

When d comes after the accent, and is followed by the diphthongs ia or ie, the triphthongs iou or eou, or the vowel u, Walker allows it, in many words, to take the sound of j; but in this he is not always consistent with himself: for in some cases he gives both sounds, d and j, in others d only, and in others j only, without any apparent reason for the difference. The following words, with their pronunciation, will illustrate his manner, and also indicate some want of consistency:—

arduous, âr'-jù-ûs;

tedious, tè'-dè-ûs, or tè'-jè-ûs;

hideous, hîd'-è-ûs, or hîd'-jè-ûs;

immediate, îm-mè'-dè-ât, or îm-mè'-jè-ât.

disobedient, dis-ô-bè'-dè-ënt;

Sheridan, in such cases, often substitutes dzh, or dy, for d. The same words are pronounced by him in the following manner:—

ô'-dzhûs,

ô-bè'-dzhënt,

âr'-dù-ûs,

tè'-dzhûs,

dis-ô-bè'-dzhënt,

hîd'-yûs,

Perry and Jones, in such cases, preserve the pure sound of the d. Fulton and Knight, though they differ from Sheridan and Walker in their method of representing the pronunciation, yet, in many cases, depart from the pure sound of the d. They pronounce the above words as follows:—

|-----------|------------------|------------|--------------|
| ô'-dyus, | o-bè'-dyent, | âr'-du-us, | im-mè'-dyat. |
| tè'-dyus, | dis-o-bè'-dyent, | hid'-yûs, | |

One of the most important points in Walker's system, with respect to which there is a diversity of opinion among the learned, relates to his pronunciation of t, when it comes after the accent, and is followed by u; as in the words nature, natural, virtue, which, according to him, here takes the sound of tsh, the words being pronounced nâ'-tshûre, nât'-tshû-râl, vèr'-tshû. Sheridan and Jones give the same sound to t when so situated; though they and Walker do not always agree with each other in the application of the rule. But the Scottish orthoëpists, Perry and Fulton and Knight, on the other hand, allow the t, so situated, to retain its pure sound.

Walker remarks (Prin., No. 463), "Nor is this tendency of t before long u found only when the accent immediately precedes; for we hear the same aspiration of this letter in spiritual, spirituous, signature, ligature, forfeiture, where the accent is two syllables before these letters." But in his notation he gives t, in the words signature and ligature, its simple sound; nor is he consistent with regard to various other words in the same predicament. To t, in the following words, aperture, caricature, confiture, decumbiture, dis-temperature, duplication, entablature, foliature, legislature, and overture, he gives the sound of tsh; while to t, in the following, intemperature, investiture, limature, nutriture, portraiture, prefecture, prelature, primogeniture, quadrature, sepulture, serrature, tablature, and temperature, he gives its simple sound.

With regard to most of the preceding words, there is certainly no good reason for the difference in the pronunciation of the last syllable. As the word caricature, according to Walker, has the accent on the last syllable, it is directly contrary to his rule (No. 463), to aspirate the t. It is, doubtless, to be regarded as an oversight; and it has been corrected, so as to make it conform to his rule. In the word legislature, the t, in the early editions of Walker's Dictionary, had its pure sound; but in the fourth edition it is aspirated. The reason of his making a distinction between legislature and literature, in this particular, appears to be, that, according to him, the former has the secondary accent on the penultimate, and the latter on the last syllable.

Though the principle, that the usage of literary and wellbred society forms the standard of pronunciation, may not be disputed, still the question may be asked, Where shall we seek this usage? The English language is spoken in countries remote from each other, each of which has its peculiarities; and even in the different parts of England there are great diversities. It is, indeed, impossible that all who speak the language, should be made to conform exactly to the same standard. But London is doubtless to be regarded not only as the political and commercial metropolis of the British empire, but also the metropolis of English literature; and the usage of her polite speakers is of higher authority, generally, to the numerous and widely dispersed people who speak the English language, than that of any other city; as is the fact with regard to other capital cities; the usage of the polite speakers of Paris and Madrid, for example, being of the highest authority with those who speak the French and Spanish languages. An orthoëpist, therefore, who is conversant with the best society of London, has, by this circumstance, other things being equal, a superiority over those who do not possess this advantage. In this respect, no one has been more favourably situated than Walker; and, in the pronunciation of the great mass of words in the language, he is supported by subsequent writers. The characteristic differences have been already pointed out; but these, as it regards most of the words affected by them, are slight, and no greater than was to be expected in a matter of such delicacy, and where the ear might be easily misled, unless disciplined by long and careful practice.

Although the usage of the best society of London is entitled to more weight than that of any other city, with regard to the many millions who speak the English language; yet it is not the only circumstance to be considered. The usage of the best society of the particular country or district, in which one resides, is not to be disregarded. We should have little respect for the taste of him who, if all with whom he was conversant, in the pronunciation of certain words, conformed to the analogy of the language, should deviate from it, because he had learned that such was the practice in London. There are some words, of which the common pronunciation in this country is more conformable to their orthography and to analogy, than that exhibited by most of the English orthoëpists; as, cucumber, gold, raisin, housewife, Rome, wrath, and wound (rhyming with sound). Walker remarks, that it was formerly the custom, in England, to pronounce merchant marchant, and that this was probably "the ancient manner of pronouncing every e in the same situation; but that this analogy is now totally exploded, except with regard to clerk, sergeant, and a few proper names." But in this country, it is not uncommon to give the e in clerk and sergeant the same sound as in merchant and servant. The word asparagus is pronounced here as it is written; nor is it the fact in this country (as Walker states it to be in England), that "the corruption of sparrowgrass is so general, that asparagus has an air of stiffness and pedantry." The following words, accept'able, commend'able, recep'tacle, confess'or, and success'or, are generally pronounced, in the United States, with the accent as it is here placed; nor does there appear to be any good reason for changing it for the accent which is more fashionable in London.

It is common in this country to pronounce are, the plural of the present tense of the verb to be, like the noun air, and were, the preterit plural of the same verb, like the noun ware; and Walker's pronunciation of these words, (âr and wêr), has sometimes been called in question, as though it were peculiar to him; but in this pronunciation he is supported by the most popular English orthoëpists, by Kenrick, Sheridan, Perry, Jones, and Fulton and Knight. With respect to the word therefore, which Walker pronounces thêr'-fore, he says (Prin. 94), the e in the first syllable is generally shortened, though he thinks improperly. It is pronounced in the same manner by Sheridan and Fulton and Knight; but Perry and Jones pronounce the first syllable like the monosyllable there.

With what fidelity the Editor of this volume has performed his task, the public will judge. Entire accuracy, in such a work, is not to be attained; yet he hopes, that, in this respect, this work will bear a favourable comparison with most others of the kind; as he is confident it will with the volumes from which it was immediately formed. Many errors may have escaped detection, but many have been corrected; those in Mr. Chalmers's work alone amount to more than two thousand. But for whatever degree of typographical accuracy the work may possess, the Editor cheerfully acknowledges it is much indebted to the care of Mr. S. Phelps, the superintendent of the press at the foundry where it has been stereotyped.

DR. JOHNSON'S PREFACE

TO HIS ABRIDGEMENT, FIRST PUBLISHED IN TWO VOLUMES, OCTAVO, 1756.

HAVING been long employed in the study and cultivation of the English language, I lately published a Dictionary, like those compiled by the academies of Italy and France, for the use of such as aspire to exactness of criticism, or elegance of style.

But it has been since considered, that works of that kind are by no means necessary to the greater number of readers, who, seldom intending to write, or presuming to judge, turn over books only to amuse their leisure, and to gain degrees of knowledge suitable to lower characters, or necessary to the common business of life: these know not any other use of a dictionary, than that of adjusting orthography, and explaining terms of science, or words of infrequent occurrence, or remote derivation.

For these purposes many dictionaries have been written by different authors, and with different degrees of skill; but none of them have yet fallen into my hands, by which even the lowest expectations could be satisfied. Some of their authors wanted industry, and others literature: some knew not their own defects, and others were too idle to supply them.

For this reason a small dictionary appeared yet to be wanting to common readers; and as I may, without arrogance, claim to myself a longer acquaintance with the lexicography of our language than any other writer has had, I shall hope to be considered as having more experience, at least, than most of my predecessors, and as more likely to accommodate the nation with a vocabulary of daily use. I therefore offer to the public an abstract or epitome of my former work.

In comparing this with other dictionaries of the same kind, it will be found to have several advantages.

I. It contains many words not to be found in any other.

II. Many barbarous terms and phrases, by which other dictionaries may vitiate the style, are rejected from this.

III. The words are more correctly spelled, partly by attention to their etymology, and partly by observation of the practice of the best authors.

IV. The etymologies and derivations, whether from foreign languages or from native roots, are more diligently traced, and more distinctly noted.

V. The senses of each word are more copiously enumerated, and more clearly explained.

VI. Many words occurring in the elder authors, such as Spenser, Shakspeare, and Milton, which had been hitherto omitted, are here carefully inserted; so that this book may serve as a glossary or expository index to the poetical writers.

VII. To the words, and to the different senses of each word, are subjoined from the large Dictionary the names of those writers by whom they have been used; so that the reader, who knows the different periods of the language, and the time of its authors, may judge of the elegance or prevalence of any word, or meaning of a word; and, without recurring to other books, may know what are antiquated, what are unusual, and what are recommended by the best authority.

The words of this Dictionary, as opposed to others, are more diligently collected, more accurately spelled, more faithfully explained, and more authentically ascertained. Of an abstract it is not necessary to say more; and I hope it will not be found that the truth requires me to say less.

CHALMERS'S ADVERTISEMENT.

To this Preface, [the preceding one of Dr. Johnson,] which exhibits the design and utility of the ABRIDGEMENT, it is necessary to add, that the labours, the research, and the extensive reading of Mr. Todd, have enriched the original work with SEVERAL THOUSAND WORDS, forming, in the whole, the greatest collection, that has ever appeared in any English dictionary.

The former editions of Dr. Johnson's Abridgement have been deficient in one respect, which was but recently discovered by a careful comparison with the original. According to the rule which the learned author appears to have prescribed to himself, but of which he has taken no notice in his Preface, this volume was "an abstract or epitome" in more respects than one. Not content with omitting the authorities as given at full length, and the etymological remarks, (a rule that has been adhered to in the present Abridgement,) Dr. Johnson left out a great number of words, which he probably deemed of inferior importance, but which, in the revolution of language, have now acquired an equal interest with those admitted. In the work, however, now before the reader, EVERY WORD in Mr. Todd's valuable edition has been given.

DR. JOHNSON'S PREFACE

TO THE FOLIO EDITION OF HIS DICTIONARY.

IT is the fate of those, who toil at the lower employments of life, to be rather driven by the fear of evil, than attracted by the prospect of good; to be exposed to censure without hope of praise; to be disgraced by miscarriage, or punished for neglect, where success would have been without applause, and diligence without reward.

Among these unhappy mortals is the writer of dictionaries, whom mankind have considered, not as the pupil, but the slave of science, the pioneer of literature, doomed only to remove rubbish and clear obstructions from the paths, through which Learning and Genius press forward to conquest and glory, without bestowing a smile on the humble drudge that facilitates their progress. Every other author may aspire to praise; the lexicographer can only hope to escape reproach; and even this negative recompense has been yet granted to very few.

I have, notwithstanding this discouragement, attempted a dictionary of the English language, which, while it was employed in the cultivation of every species of literature, has itself been hitherto neglected, suffered to spread, under the direction of chance, into wild exuberance, resigned to the tyranny of time and fashion, and exposed to the corruptions of ignorance, and caprices of innovation.

When I took the first survey of my undertaking, I found our speech copious without order, and energetick without rules: wherever I turned my view, there was perplexity to be disentangled, and confusion to be regulated; choice was to be made out of boundless variety, without any established principle of selection; adulterations were to be detected, without a settled test of purity; and modes of expression to be rejected or received, without the suffrages of any writers of classical reputation or acknowledged authority.

Having therefore no assistance but from general grammar, I applied myself to the perusal of our writers; and, noting whatever might be of use to ascertain or illustrate any word or phrase, accumulated, in time, the materials of a dictionary, which, by degrees, I reduced to method, establishing to myself, in the progress of the work, such rules as experience and analogy suggested to me; experience, which practice and observation were continually increasing; and analogy, which, though in some words obscure, was evident in others.

In adjusting the ORTHOGRAPHY, which has been to this time unsettled and fortuitous, I found it necessary to distinguish those irregularities that are inherent in our tongue, and perhaps coeval with it, from others which the ignorance or negligence of later writers has produced. Every language has its anomalies, which, though inconvenient, and in themselves once unnecessary, must be tolerated among the imperfections of human things, and which require only to be registered, that they may not be increased, and ascertained, that they may not be confounded; but every language has likewise its improprieties and absurdities, which it is the duty of the lexicographer to correct or proscribe.

As language was at its beginning merely oral, all words of necessary or common use were spoken before they were written; and, while they were unfixed by any visible signs, must have been spoken with great diversity, as we now observe those who cannot read, catch sounds imperfectly, and utter them negligently. When this wild and barbarous jargon was first reduced to an alphabet, every penman endeavoured to express as he could the sounds which he was accustomed to pronounce or to receive, and vitiated in writing such words as were already vitiated in speech. The powers of the letters, when they were applied to a new language, must have been vague and unsettled, and therefore different hands would exhibit the same sound by different combinations.

From this uncertain pronunciation arise, in a great part, the various dialects of the same country, which will always be observed to grow fewer, and less different, as books are multiplied; and from this arbitrary representation of sounds by letters, proceeds that diversity of spelling observable in the Saxon remains, and, I suppose, in the first books of every nation, which perplexes or destroys analogy, and produces anomalous formations, that, being once incorporated, can never be afterwards dismissed or reformed.

Of this kind are the derivatives length from long, strength from strong, darling from dear, breadth from broad, from dry, drought, and from high, height, which Milton, in zeal for analogy, writes highth: "Quid te exempta juvat spinis de pluribus una?" To change all would be too much, and to change one is nothing.

This uncertainty is most frequent in the vowels, which are so capriciously pronounced, and so differently modified, by accident or affectation, not only in every province, but in every mouth, that to them, as is well known to etymologists, little regard is to be shown in the deduction of one language from another.

Such defects are not errors in orthography, but spots of barbarity impressed so deep in the English language, that criticism can never wash them away; these, therefore, must be permitted to remain untouched: but many words have likewise been altered by accident, or depraved by ignorance, as the pronunciation of the vulgar has been weakly followed; and some still continue to be variously written, as authors differ in their care or skill; of these it was proper to inquire the true orthography, which I have always considered as depending on their derivation, and have therefore referred them to their original languages: thus I write enchant, enchantment, enchanter, after the French, and incantation after the Latin; thus entire is chosen rather than intire, because it passed to us not from the Latin integer, but from the French entier.

Of many words it is difficult to say whether they were immediately received from the Latin or the French, since, at the time when we had dominions in France, we had Latin service in our churches. It is, however, my opinion, that the French generally supplied us; for we have few Latin words, among the terms of domestic use, which are not French; but many French, which are very remote from Latin.

Even in words of which the derivation is apparent, I have been often obliged to sacrifice uniformity to custom; thus I write, in compliance with a numberless majority, convey and inveigh, deceit and receipt, fancy and phantom; sometimes the derivative varies from the primitive, as explanation and explanation, repeat and repetition.

Some combinations of letters, having the same power, are used indifferently without any discoverable reason of choice, as in choak, choke; soap, sop; fenel, fuel, and many others, which I have sometimes inserted twice, that those, who search for them under either form, may not search in vain.

In examining the orthography of any doubtful word, the mode of spelling, by which it is inserted in the series of the dictionary, is to be considered as that to which I give perhaps not often rashly, the preference. I have left, in the examples, to every author his own practice unmolested, that the reader may balance suffrages, and judge between us; but this question is not always to be determined by reputed or by real learning; some men, intent upon greater things, have thought little on sounds and derivations; some, knowing in the ancient tongues, have neglected those in which our words are commonly to be sought. Thus Hammond writes feasibleness, for feasibleness, because, I suppose, he imagined it derived immediately from the Latin; and some words, such as dependant, dependent, dependance, dependence, vary their final syllable, as one or another language is present to the writer.

In this part of the work, where caprice has long wanted without control, and vanity sought praise by petty reformation, I have endeavoured to proceed with a scholar's reverence for antiquity, and a grammarian's regard to the genius of our tongue. I have attempted a few alterations, and, among those few, perhaps the greater part is from the modern to the ancient practice; and I hope I may be allowed to recommend to those, whose thoughts have been, perhaps, employed too anxiously on verbal singularities, not to disturb, upon narrow views, or for minute propriety, the orthography of their fathers. It has been asserted, that for the law to be known, is of more importance than to be right. Change, says Hooker, is not made without inconvenience, even from worse to better. There is in constancy and stability a general and lasting advantage, which will always overbalance the slow improvements of gradual correction. Much less ought our written language to comply with the corruptions of oral utterance, or copy that which every variation of time or place makes different from itself, and imitate those changes, which will again be changed while imitation is employed in observing them.

This recommendation of steadiness and uniformity does not proceed from an opinion, that particular combinations of letters have much influence on human happiness, or that truth may not be successfully taught by modes of spelling fanciful and erroneous: I am not yet so lost in lexicography, as to forget that words are the daughters of earth, and that things are the sons of heaven. Language is only the instrument of science, and words are but the signs of ideas: I wish, however, that the instrument might be less apt to decay, and that signs might be permanent, like the things which they denote.

In setting the orthography, I have not wholly neglected the pronunciation, which I have directed, by printing an accent upon the acute or elevated syllable. It will sometimes be found, that the accent is placed by the author quoted on a different syllable from that marked in the alphabetical series; it is then to be understood, that custom has varied, or that the author has, in my opinion, pronounced wrong. Short directions are sometimes given where the sound of letters is irregular; and, if they are sometimes omitted, defect in such minute observations will be more easily excused than superfluity.

In the investigation both of the orthography and signification of words, their ETYMOLOGY was necessarily to be considered, and they were therefore to be divided into primitives and derivatives. A primitive word is that which can be traced no further to any English root; thus circumspect, circumvent, circumstance, delude, concave, and complicate, though compounds in the Latin, are to us primitives. Derivatives are all those that can be referred to any word in English of greater simplicity.

The derivatives I have referred to their primitives with an accuracy sometimes needless; for who does not see that remoteness comes from remote, lovely from love, concavity from concave, and demonstrative from demonstrate? but this grammatical exuberance the scheme of my work did not allow me to repress. It is of great importance, in examining the general fabric of a language, to trace one word from another, by noting the usual modes of derivation and inflection; and uniformity must be preserved in systematical works, though sometimes at the expense of particular propriety.

Among other derivatives I have been careful to insert and elucidate the anomalous plurals of nouns and preterits of verbs, which in the Teutonic dialects are very frequent, and, though familiar to those who have always used them, interrupt and embarrass the learners of our language.

The two languages from which our primitives have been derived are the Roman and Teutonic; under the Roman I comprehend the French and provincial tongues; and under the Teutonic range the Saxon, German, and all their kindred dialects. Most of our polysyllables are Roman, and our words of one syllable are very often Teutonic.

In assigning the Roman original, it has, perhaps, sometimes happened, that I have mentioned only the Latin, when the word was borrowed from the French; and, considering myself as employed only in the illustration of my own language, I have not been very careful to observe whether the Latin word be pure or barbarous, or the French elegant or obsolete.

For the Teutonic etymologies I am commonly indebted to Junius and Skinner, the only names which I have forbore to quote when I copied their books: not that I might appropriate their labours or usurp their honours, but that I might spare a perpetual repetition by one general acknowledgement. Of these, whom I ought not to mention but with reverence due to instructors and benefactors, Junius appears to have excelled in extent of learning, and Skinner in rectitude of understanding. Junius was accurately skilled in all the northern languages; Skinner probably examined the ancient and remoter dialects only by occasional inspection into dictionaries: but the learning of Junius is often of no other use than to show him a track by which he might deviate from his purpose, to which Skinner always presses forward by the shortest way. Skinner is often ignorant, but never ridiculous. Junius is always full of knowledge; but his variety distracts his judgement, and his learning is very frequently disgraced by his absurdities.

The votaries of the northern muses will not, perhaps, easily restrain their indignation, when they find the name of Junius thus degraded by a disadvantageous comparison; but, whatever reverence is due to his diligence or his attainments, it can be no criminal degree of censoriousness to charge that etymologist with want of judgement, who can seriously derive dream from drama, because life is a drama, and a drama is a dream; and who declares, with a tone of defiance, that no man can fail to derive mean from μῆνος, Gr. (monos), single or solitary, who considers that grief naturally loves to be alone.*

Our knowledge of the northern literature is so scanty, that of words undoubtedly Teutonic the original is not always to be found in any ancient language; and I have therefore inserted Dutch or German substitutes, which I consider not as radical, but parallel, not as the parents, but sisters of the English.

The words which are represented as thus related by descent or cognation, do not always agree in sense; for it is incident to words, as to their authors, to degenerate from their ancestors, and to change their manners, when they change their country. It is sufficient, in etymological inquiries, if the senses of kindred words be found such as may easily pass into each other, or such as may both be referred to one general idea.

The etymology, so far as it is yet known, was easily found in the volumes where it is particularly and professedly delivered; and, by proper attention to the rules of derivation, the orthography was soon adjusted. But to COLLECT the WORDS of our language was a task of greater difficulty: the deficiency of dictionaries was immediately apparent; and, when they were exhausted, what was yet wanting must be sought by fortuitous and unguided excursions into books, and gleaned, as industry should find, or chance should offer it, in the boundless chaos of a living speech. My search, however, has been either skilful or lucky; for I have much augmented the vocabulary.

As my design was a dictionary, common or appellative, I have omitted all words which have relation to proper names; such as Arian, Socinian, Calvinist, Benedictine, Mahometan; but have retained those of a more general nature, as Heathen, Pagan.

Of the terms of art I have received such as could be found either in books of science or technical dictionaries; and have often inserted, from philosophical writers, words which are supported perhaps only by a single authority, and which, being not admitted into general use, stand yet as candidates or probationers, and must depend for their adoption on the suffrage of futurity.

The words which our authors have introduced by their knowledge of foreign languages, or ignorance of their own, by vanity or wantonness, by compliance with fashion or lust of innovation, I have registered as they occurred, though commonly only to censure them, and warn others against the folly of naturalizing useless foreigners to the injury of the natives.

I have not rejected any by design, merely because they were unnecessary or exuberant; but have received those which by different writers have been differently formed, as viscid and visciditudo, viscous and viscosity.

* That I may not appear to have spoken too irreverently of Junius, I have here subjoined a few specimens of his etymological extravagance.

Compounded or double words I have seldom noted, except when they obtain a signification different from that which the components have in their simple state. Thus, hig-wayman, wood-man, and horse-courser, require an explanation; but of thieftike or coach-driver no notice was needed, because the primitives contain the meaning of the compounds.

Words arbitrarily formed by a constant and settled analogy, like diminutive adjectives in ish, as greenish, bluish; adverbs in ly, as dully, openly; substantives in ness, as pitiless, faultiness: were less diligently sought, and sometimes have been omitted, when I had no authority that invited me to insert them; not that they are not genuine and regular offsprings of English roots, but because their relation to the primitive being always the same, their significations cannot be mistaken.

The verbal nouns in ing, such as the keeping of the castle, the leading of the army, are always neglected, or placed only to illustrate the sense of the verb, except when they signify things as well as actions, and have therefore a plural number, as dwelling, living; or have an absolute and abstract signification, as colouring, painting, learning.

The participles are likewise omitted, unless, by signifying rather habit or quality than action, they take the nature of adjectives; as a thinking man, a man of prudence; a pacing horse, a horse that can pace: these I have ventured to call participial adjectives. But neither are these always inserted, because they are commonly to be understood, without any danger of mistake, by consulting the verb.

Obsolete words are admitted, when they are found in authors not obsolete, or when they have any force or beauty that may deserve revival.

As composition is one of the chief characteristics of a language, I have endeavoured to make some reparation for the universal negligence of my predecessors, by inserting great numbers of compounded words, as may be found under after, fore, new, night, fair, and many more. These, numerous as they are, might be multiplied, but that use and curiosity are here satisfied, and the frame of our language and modes of our combination amply discovered.

Of some forms of composition, such as that by which re is prefixed to note repetition, and un to signify contrariety or privation, all the examples cannot be accumulated, because the use of these particles, if not wholly arbitrary, is so little limited, that they are hourly affixed to new words, as occasion requires, or is imagined to require them.

There is another kind of composition, more frequent in our language than perhaps in any other, from which arises to foreigners the greatest difficulty. We modify the signification of many words by a particle subjoined, as to come off, to escape by a fetch; to fall on, to attack; to fall off, to apostatize; to break off, to stop abruptly; to bear out, to justify; to fall in, to comply; to give over, to cease; to set off, to embellish; to set in, to begin a continual tencour; to set out, to begin a course or journey; to take off, to copy; with innumerable expressions of the same kind, of which some appear wildly irregular, being so far distant from the sense of the simple words, that no sagacity will be able to trace the steps by which they arrived at the present use. These I have noted with great care; and, though I cannot flatter myself that the collection is complete, I believe I have so far assisted the students of our language, that this kind of phraseology will be no longer insuperable, and the combinations of verbs and particles, by chance omitted, will be easily explained by comparison with those that may be found.

Many words yet stand supported only by the name of Bailey, Ainsworth, Phillips, or the contracted Dict. for Dictionaries subjoined; of these I am not always certain that they are read in any book but the works of lexicographers. Of such I have omitted many, because I had never read them; and many I have inserted, because they may perhaps exist, though they have escaped my notice: they are, however, to be yet considered as resting only upon the credit of former dictionaries. Others, which I considered as useful, or known to be proper, though I could not at present support them by authorities, I have offered to stand upon my own attestation, claiming the same privilege with my predecessors, of being sometimes credited without proof.

The words, thus selected and disposed, are grammatically considered; they are referred to the different parts of speech; traced, when they are irregularly inflected, through their various terminations; and illustrated by observations, not indeed of great or striking importance, separately considered, but necessary to the elucidation of our language, and hitherto neglected or forgotten by English grammarians.

That part of my work, on which I expect malignity most frequently to fasten, is the Explanation; in which I cannot hope to satisfy those, who are, perhaps, not inclined to be pleased, since I have not always been able to satisfy myself. To interpret a language by itself is very difficult; many words cannot be explained by synonymes, because the idea signified by them has not more than one appellation; nor by paraphrase, because simple ideas cannot be described. When the nature of things is unknown, or the notion unsettled and indefinite, and various in various minds, the words by which such notions are conveyed, or such things denoted, will be ambiguous and perplexed. And such is the fate of hapless lexicography, that not only darkness, but light, impedes and distresses it; things may be not only too little, but too much known, to be happily illustrated. To explain, requires the use of terms less abstruse than that which is to be explained, and such terms cannot always be found; for, as nothing can be proved but by supposing something intuitively known, and evident without proof, so nothing can be defined but by the use of words too plain to admit a definition.

Other words there are, of which the sense is too subtle and evanescent to be fixed in a paraphrase; such are ad those which are by the grammarians termed expletives, and, in dead languages, are suffered to pass for empty sounds, of no other use than to fill a verse, or to modulate a period, but which are easily perceived in living tongues to have power and emphasis, though it be sometimes such as no other form of expression can convey.

My labour has likewise been much increased by a class of verbs too frequent in the English language, of which the signification is so loose and general, the use so vague and indeterminate, and the senses detorted so widely from the first idea, that it is hard to trace them through the maze of variation, to catch them on the brink of utter inanity, to circumscribe them by any limitations, or interpret them by any words of distinct and settled meaning: such are bear, break, come, cast, fall, get, give, do, put, set, go, run, make, take, turn, throw. If of these the whole power is not accurately delivered, it must be remembered, that, while our language is yet living, and variable by the caprice of every one that speaks it, these words are hourly shifting their relations, and can no more be ascertained in a dictionary, than a grove, in the agitation of a storm, can be accurately delineated from its picture in the water.

The particles are among all nations applied with so great latitude, that they are not easily reducible under any regular scheme of explication; this difficulty is not less, nor perhaps greater, in English than in other languages. I have laboured them with diligence. I hope with success; such at least as can be expected in a task, which no man, however learned or sagacious, has yet been able to perform.

Some words there are which I cannot explain, because I do not understand them: these might have been omitted very often with little inconvenience, but I would not so far indulge my vanity as to decline this confession; for, when Tully owns himself ignorant whether lessus, in the Twelve Tables, means a funeral song, or mourning garment: and Aristotle doubts whether oûpvs, in the Iliad, signifies a mule, or muleteer, I may surely, without shame, leave some obscurities to happier industry or future information.

The rigour of interpretative lexicography requires that the explanation, and the word explained, should be always reciprocal; this I have always endeavoured, but could not always attain. Words are seldom exactly synonymous; a new term was not introduced, but because the former was thought inadequate; names, therefore, have often many ideas, but few ideas have many names. It was then necessary to use the proximate word; for the deficiency of single terms can very seldom be supplied by circumlocution; nor is the inconvenience great of such mutilated interpretations, because the sense may easily be collected entire from the examples.

In every word of extensive use, it was requisite to mark the progress of its meaning, and show by what gradations of intermediate sense it has passed from its primitive to its remote and accidental signification; so that every foregoing explanation should tend to that which follows, and the series be regularly concatenated from the first notion to the last.

This is specious, but not always practicable; kindred senses may be so interwoven, that the perplexity cannot be disentangled, nor any reason be assigned why one should be ranged before the other. When the radical idea branches out into parallel ramifications, how can a consecutive series be formed of senses in their nature collateral? The shades of meaning sometimes pass imperceptibly into each other; so that, though on one side they apparently differ, yet it is impossible to mark the point of contact. Ideas of the same race, though not exactly alike, are sometimes so little different, that no words can express the dissimilitude, though the mind easily perceives it, when they are exhibited together; and sometimes there is such a confusion of acceptations, that discernment is wearied, and distinction puzzled, and perseverance herself hurries to an end, by crowding together what she cannot separate.

These complaints of difficulty will, by those that have never considered words beyond their popular use, be thought only the jargon of a man willing to magnify his labours, and procure veneration to his studies by involution and obscurity. But every art is obscure to those that have not learned it: this uncertainty of terms, and commixture of ideas, is well known to those who have joined philosophy with grammar; and if I have not expressed them very clearly, it must be remembered that I am speaking of that which words are insufficient to explain.

The original sense of words is often driven out of use by their metaphorical acceptations, yet must be inserted for the sake of a regular origination. Thus I know not whether ardour is used for material heat, or whether flagrant, in English, ever signifies the same with burning; yet such are the primitive ideas of these words, which are therefore set first, though without examples, that the figurative senses may be commodiously deduced.

Such is the exuberance of signification which many words have obtained, that it was scarcely possible to collect all their senses; sometimes the meaning of derivatives must be sought in the mother term, and sometimes deficient explanations of the primitive may be supplied in the train of derivation. In any case of doubt or difficulty, it will be always proper to examine all the words of the same race; for some words are slightly passed over to avoid repetition, some admitted easier and clearer explanation than others, and all will be better understood, as they are considered in greater variety of structures and relations.

All the interpretations of words are not written with the same skill, or the same happiness: things, equally easy in themselves, are not all equally easy to any single mind. Every writer of a long work commits errors, where there appears neither ambiguity to mislead, nor obscurity to confound him; and, in a search like this, many felicities of expression will be casually overlooked, many convenient parallels will be forgotten, and many particulars will admit improvement from a mind utterly unequal to the whole performance.

But many seeming faults are to be imputed rather to the nature of the undertaking, than the negligence of the performer. Thus some explanations are unavoidably reciprocal or circular, as kind, the female of the stag; stag, the male of the kind: sometimes easier words are changed into harder, as burial into sepulture or interment, drier into desiccative, dryness into siccity or aridity, fit into paroxysm; for the easiest word, whatever it be, can never be translated into one more easy. But easiness and difficulty are merely relative; and, if the present prevalence of our language should invite foreigners to this Dictionary, many will be assisted by those words which now seem only to increase or produce obscurity. For this reason I have endeavoured frequently to join a Teutonic or Roman interpretation, as to cheer, to gladden, or exhilarate; that every learner of English may be assisted by his own tongue.

The solution of all difficulties, and the supply of all defects, must be sought in the examples subjoined to the various senses of each word, and ranged according to the time of their authors.

When first I collected these authorities, I was desirous that every quotation should be useful to some other end than the illustration of a word: I therefore extracted from philosophers principles of science; from historians remarkable facts; from chymists complete processes; from divines striking exhortations; and from poets beautiful descriptions. Such is design, while it is yet at a distance from execution. When the time called upon me to range this accumulation of elegance and wisdom into an alphabetical series, I soon discovered that the bulk of my volumes would fright away the student, and was forced to depart from my scheme of including all that was pleasing or useful in English literature, and reduce my transcripts very often to clusters of words in which scarcely any meaning is retained: thus, to the weariness of copying, I was condemned to add the vexation of expunging. Some passages I have yet spared, which may relieve the labour of verbal searches, and intersperse with verdure and flowers the dusty deserts of barren philology.

The examples, thus mutilated, are no longer to be considered as conveying the sentiments or doctrine of their authors: the word for the sake of which they are inserted, with all its appendant clauses, has been carefully preserved; but it may sometimes happen, by hasty detraction, that the general tendency of the sentence may be changed: the divine may desert his tenets, or the philosopher his system.

Some of the examples have been taken from writers who were never mentioned as masters of elegance or models of style; but words must be sought where they are used; and in what pages, eminent for purity, can terms of manufacture or agriculture be found? Many quotations serve no other purpose than that of proving the bare existence of words, and are therefore selected with less scrupulousness than those which are to teach their structures and relations.

My purpose was to admit no testimony of living authors, that I might not be misled by partiality, and that none of my contemporaries might have reason to complain; nor have I departed from this resolution, but when some performance of uncommon excellence excited my veneration, when my memory supplied me from late books with an example that was wanting, or when my heart, in the tenderness of friendship, solicited admission for a favourite name.

So far have I been from any care to grace my pages with modern decorations, that I have studiously endeavoured to collect examples and authorities from the writers before the Restoration, whose works I regard as the wells of English undefiled, as the pure sources of genuine diction. Our language, for almost a century, has, by the concurrence of many causes, been gradually departing from its original Teutonic character, and deviating toward a Gallic structure and phraseology, from which it ought to be our endeavour to recall it, by making our ancient volumes the ground work of style, admitting among the additions of later times only such as may supply real deficiencies; such as are readily adopted by the genius of our tongue, and incorporate easily with our native idioms.

But as every language has a time of rudeness antecedent to perfection, as well as of false refinement and declension, I have been cautious lest my zeal for antiquity might drive me into times too remote, and crowd my book with words now no longer understood. I have fixed Sidney's work for the boundary, beyond which I made few excursions. From the authors, which rose in the time of Elizabeth, a speech might be formed adequate to all the purposes of use and elegance. If the language of theology were extracted from Hooker and the translation of the Bible; the terms of natural knowledge from Bacon; the phrases of policy, war, and navigation, from Raleigh; the dialect of poetry and fiction from Spenser and Sidney; and the diction of common life from Shakspeare, few ideas would be lost to mankind, for want of English words, in which they might be expressed.

It is not sufficient that a word is found, unless it be so combined as that its meaning is apparently determined by the tract and tenour of the sentence; such passages I have therefore chosen; and when it happened that any author gave a definition of a term, or such an explanation as is equivalent to a definition, I have placed his authority as a supplement to my own, without regard to the chronological order that is otherwise observed.

Some words, indeed, stand unsupported by any authority; but they are commonly derivative nouns or adverbs, formed from their primitives by regular and constant analogy, or names of things seldom occurring in books, or words of which I have reason to doubt the existence.

There is more danger of censure from the multiplicity than paucity of examples; authorities will sometimes seem to have been accumulated without necessity or use, and perhaps some will be found, which might, without loss, have been omitted. But a work of this kind is not hastily to be charged with superfluities: those quotations, which to careless or unskilful perusers, appear only to repeat the same sense, will often exhibit, to a more accurate examiner, diversities of significations, or, at least, afford different shades of the same meaning: one will show the word applied to persons, another to things; one will express an ill, another a good, and a third a neutral sense; one will prove the expression genuine from an ancient author, another will show it elegant from a modern; a doubtful authority is corroborated by another of more credit; an ambiguous sentence is ascertained by a passage clear and determinate; the word, how often soever repeated, appears with new associates and in different combinations, and every quotation contributes something to the stability or enlargement of the language.

When words are used equivocally, I receive them in either sense; when they are metaphorical, I adopt them in their primitive acceptation.

I have sometimes, though rarely, yielded to the temptation of exhibiting a genealogy of sentiments, by showing how one author copied the thoughts and diction of another: such quotations are indeed little more than repetitions, which might justly be censured, did they not gratify the mind, by affording a kind of intellectual history.

The various syntactical structures occurring in the examples have been carefully noted; the license or negligence, with which many words have been hitherto used, has made our style capricious and indeterminate: when the different combinations of the same word are exhibited together, the preference is readily given to propriety, and I have often endeavoured to direct the choice.

Thus I have laboured, by settling the orthography dia-playing the analogy, regulating the structures, and ascertaining the signification of English words, to perform all the parts of a faithful lexicographer: but I have not always executed my own scheme, or satisfied my own expectations. The work, whatever proofs of diligence and attention it may exhibit, is yet capable of many improvements: the orthography which I recommend is still controvertible; the etymology which I adopt is uncertain, and perhaps frequently erroneous; the explanations are sometimes too much contracted, and sometimes too much diffused; the significations are distinguished rather with subtlety than skill, and the attention is harassed with unnecessary minuteness.

The examples are too often injudiciously truncated, and perhaps sometimes, I hope very rarely, alleged in a mistaken sense; for in making this collection I trusted more to memory than, in a state of disquiet and embarrassment, memory can contain; and purposed to supply at the review what was left incomplete in the first transcription.

Many terms appropriated to particular occupations, though necessary and significant, are undoubtedly omitted; and of the words most studiously considered and exemplified, many senses have escaped observation.

Yet these failures, however frequent, may admit extenuation and apology. To have attempted much is always laudable, even when the enterprise is above the strength that undertakes it. To rest below his own aim is incident to every one whose fancy is active, and whose views are comprehensive; nor is any man satisfied with himself because he has done much, but because he can conceive little. When first I engaged in this work, I resolved to leave neither words nor things unexamined, and pleased myself with a prospect of the hours which I should revel away in feasts of literature, with the obscure recesses of northern learning which I should enter and ransack, the treasures with which I expected every search into those neglected mines to reward my labour, and the triumph with which I should display my acquisitions to mankind. When I had thus inquired into the original of words, I resolved to show, likewise, my attention to things; to pierce deep into every science, to inquire the nature of every substance of which I inserted the name, to limit every idea by a definition strictly logical, and exhibit every production of art or nature in an accurate description, that my book might be in place of all other dictionaries whether appellative or technical. But these were the dreams of a poet, doomed at last to wake a lexicographer. I soon found that it is too late to look for instruments, when the work calls for execution; and that whatever abilities I had brought to my task, with those I must finally perform it. To deliberate whenever I doubted, to inquire whenever I was ignorant, would have protracted the undertaking without end, and, perhaps, without much improvement; for I did not find by my first experiments, that what I had not of my own was easily to be obtained: I saw that one inquiry only gave occasion to another, that book referred to book, that to search was not always to find, and to find was not always to be informed; and thus to pursue perfection was, like the first inhabitants of Arcadia, to chase the sun, which, when they had reached the hill where he seemed to rest, was still beheld at the same distance from them.

I then contracted my design, determining to confide in myself, and no longer to solicit auxiliaries, which produced more embarrassment than assistance; by this I obtained at least one advantage, that I set limits to my work, which would in time be ended, though not completed.

Despondency has never so far prevailed as to depress me to negligence; some faults will at last appear to be the effects of anxious diligence and persevering activity. The nice and subtle ramifications of meaning were not easily avoided by a mind intent upon accuracy, and convinced of the necessity of disentangling combinations, and separating similitudes. Many of the distinctions, which to common readers appear useless and idle, will be found real and important by men versed in the school of philosophy, without which no dictionary can ever be accurately compiled, or skillfully examined.

Some senses, however, there are, which, though not the same, are yet so nearly allied, that they are often confounded. Most men think indistinctly, and therefore cannot speak with exactness; and consequently some examples might be indifferently put to either signification: this uncertainty is not to be imputed to me, who do not form but register the language; who do not teach men how they should think, but relate how they have hitherto expressed their thoughts.

The imperfect sense of some examples I lamented, but could not remedy, and hope they will be compensated by innumerable passages selected with propriety, and preserved with exactness; some shining with sparks of imagination, and some replete with treasures of wisdom.

The orthography and etymology, though imperfect, are not imperfect for want of care, but because care will not always be successful, and recollection or information come too late for use.

That many terms of art and manufacture are omitted, must be frankly acknowledged; but for this defect I may boldly allege that it was unavoidable: I could not visit caverns to learn the miner's language, nor take a voyage to perfect my skill in the dialect of navigation, nor visit the warehouses of merchants, and shops of artificers, to gain the names of wares, tools, and operations, of which no mention is found in books: what favourable accident, or easy inquiry, brought within my reach, has not been neglected; but it had been a hopeless labour to glean up words, by courting living information, and contesting with the sullenness of one, and the roughness of another.

To furnish the academicians della Crusca with words of this kind, a series of comedies called la Fiera, or the Fair, was professedly written by Buonarrotti; but I had no such assistant, and therefore was content to wait what they must have wanted likewise, had they not luckily been so supplied.

Nor are all words, which are not found in the vocabulary, to be lamented as omissions. Of the laborious and mercantile part of the people, the diction is, in a great measure, casual and mutable; many of their terms are formed for some temporary or local convenience, and, though current at certain times and places, are in others utterly unknown. This fugitive cant, which is always in a state of increase or decay, cannot be regarded as any part of the durable materials of a language, and therefore must be suffered to perish with other things unworthy of preservation.

Care will sometimes betray to the appearance of negligence. He that is catching opportunities which seldom occur, will suffer those to pass by unregarded, which he expects hourly to return; he that is searching for rare and remote things, will neglect those that are obvious and familiar: thus many of the most common and cursory words have been inserted with little illustration, because, in gathering the authorities, I forbore to copy those which I thought likely to occur whenever they were wanted. It is remarkable that, in reviewing my collection, I found the word SEA unexemplified.

Thus it happens, that in things difficult there is danger from ignorance, and in things easy from confidence; the mind, afraid of greatness and disdainful of littleness, hastily withdraws herself from painful searches, and passes with scornful rapidity over tasks not adequate to her powers; sometimes too secure for caution, and again too anxious for vigorous effort; sometimes idle in a plain path, and sometimes distracted in labyrinths, and dissipated by different intentions.

A large work is difficult because it is large, even though all its parts might singly be performed with facility; where there are many things to be done, each must be allowed its share of time and labour, in the proportion only which it bears to the whole; nor can it be expected, that the stones, which form the dome of a temple, should be squared and polished like the diamond of a ring.

Of the event of this work, for which, having laboured it with so much application, I cannot but have some degree of parental fondness, it is natural to form conjectures. Those who have been persuaded to think well of my design, will require that it should fix our language, and put a stop to those alterations which time and chance have hitherto been suffered to make in it without opposition. With this consequence I will confess that I flattered myself for a while; but now begin to fear that I have indulged expectation which neither reason nor experience can justify. When we see men grow old and die at a certain time one after another, from century to century, we laugh at the elixir that promises to prolong life to a thousand years; and with equal justice may the lexicographer be derided, who, being able to produce no example of a nation that has preserved their words and phrases from mutability, shall imagine that his dictionary can embalm his language, and secure it from corruption and decay; that it is in his power to change sublunary nature, and clear the world at once from folly, vanity, and affectation.

With this hope, however, academies have been instituted, to guard the avenues of their languages, to retain fugitives, and repulse intruders; but their vigilance and activity have hitherto been vain; sounds are too volatile and subtle for legal restraints; to enchain syllables, and to lash the wind, are equally the undertakings of pride, unwilling to measure its desires by its strength. The French language has visibly changed under the inspection of the academy; the style of Amélot's translation of father Paul is observed by Le Courayer to be un peu passé; and no Italian will maintain, that the diction of any modern writer is not perceptibly different from that of Boccaccio, Machiavel, or Caro.

Total and sudden transformations of a language seldom happen; conquests and migrations are now very rare; but there are other causes of change, which, though slow in their operation, and invisible in their progress, are, perhaps, as much superiour to human resistance, as the revolutions of the sky, or intumescence of the tide. Commerce, however necessary, however lucrative, as it depraves the manners, corrupts the language: they that have frequent intercourse with strangers, to whom they endeavour to accommodate themselves, must in time learn a mingled dialect, like the jargon which serves the traffickers on the Mediterranean and Indian coasts. This will not always be confined to the exchange, the warehouse, or the port, but will be communicated by degrees to other ranks of the people, and be at last incorporated with the current speech.

There are likewise internal causes equally forcible. The language most likely to continue long without alteration, would be that of a nation raised a little, and but a little, above barbarity, secluded from strangers, and totally employed in pursuing the conveniences of life; either without books, or, like some of the Mahometan countries, with very few: men thus busied and unlearned, having only such words as common use requires, would perhaps long continue to express the same notions by the same signs. But no such constancy can be expected in a people polished by arts, and classed by subordination, where one part of the community is sustained and accommodated by the labour of the other. Those, who have much leisure to think, will always be enlarging the stock of ideas; and every increase of knowledge, whether real or fancied, will produce new words, or combinations of words. When the mind is unchained from necessity, it will range after convenience; when it is left at large in the fields of speculation, it will shift opinions; as any custom is disused, the words that expressed it must perish with it; as any opinion grows popular, it will innovate speech in the same proportion as it alters practice.

As by the cultivation of various sciences a language is amplified, it will be more furnished with words deflected from their original sense: the geometrician will talk of a courtier's zenith, or the eccentric virtue of a wild hero; and the physician of sanguine expectations and phlegmatic delays. Copiousness of speech will give opportunities to capricious choice, by which some words will be preferred, and others degraded; vicissitudes of fashion will enforce the use of new, or extend the signification of known terms. The tropes of poetry will make hourly encroachments, and the metaphorical will become the current sense: pronunciation will be varied by levity or ignorance, and the pen must at length comply with the tongue; illiterate writers will, at one time or other, by public infatuation, rise into renown, who, not knowing the original import of words, will use them with colloquial licentiousness, confound distinction, and forget propriety. As politeness increases, some expressions will be considered as too gross and vulgar for the delicate, others as too formal and ceremonious for the gay and airy; new phrases are therefore adopted, which must, for the same reasons, be in time dismissed. Swift, in his petty treatise on the English language, allows that new words must sometimes be introduced, but proposes that none should be suffered to become obsolete. But what makes a word obsolete more than general agreement to forbear it? and how shall it be continued, when it conveys an offensive idea, or recalled again into the mouths of mankind, when it has once become unfamiliar by disuse, and unpleasing by unfamiliarity?

There is another cause of alteration, more prevalent than any other, which yet, in the present state of the world, cannot be obviated. A mixture of two languages will produce a third distinct from both; and they will always be mixed, where the chief part of education, and the most conspicuous accomplishment, is skill in ancient or in foreign tongues. He that has long cultivated another language, will find its words and combinations crowd upon his memory; and haste and negligence, refinement and affectation, will obtrude borrowed terms and exotic expressions.

The great pest of speech is frequency of translation. No book was ever turned from one language into another, without imparting something of its native idiom; this is the most mischievous and comprehensive innovation; single words may enter by thousands, and the fabric of the tongue continue the same; but new phraseology changes much at once; it alters not the single stones of the building, but the order of the columns. If an academy should be established for the cultivation of our style, which I, who can never wish to see dependence multiplied, hope the spirit of English liberty will hinder or destroy, let them, instead of compiling grammars and dictionaries, endeavour, with all their influence, to stop the license of translators, whose idleness and ignorance, if it be suffered to proceed, will reduce us to babble a dialect of France.

If the changes that we fear be thus irresistible, what remains but to acquiesce with silence as in the other insurmountable distresses of humanity? It remains that we retard what we cannot repel, that we palliate what we cannot cure. Life may be lengthened by care, though death cannot be ultimately defeated; tongues, like governments, have a natural tendency to degeneration; we have long preserved our constitution, let us make some struggles for our language.

In hope of giving longevity to that which its own nature forbids to be immortal, I have devoted this book, the labour of years, to the honour of my country, that we may no longer yield the palm of philology, without a contest to the nations of the continent. The chief glory of every people arises from its authors: whether I shall add any thing by my own writings to the reputation of English literature, must be left to time: much of my life has been lost under the pressures of disease; much has been trifled away; and much has always been spent in provision for the day that was passing over me: but I shall not think my employment useless or ignoble, if, by my assistance, foreign nations and distant ages gain access to the propagators of knowledge, and understand the teachers of truth; if my labours afford light to the repositories of science, and add celebrity to Bacon, to Hooker, to Milton, and to Boyle.

When I am animated by this wish, I look with pleasure on my book, however defective, and deliver it to the world with the spirit of a man that has endeavoured well. That it will immediately become popular, I have not promised to myself: a few wild blunders, and risible absurdities, from which no work of such multiplicity was ever free, may for a time furnish folly with laughter, and harden ignorance in contempt; but useful diligence will at last prevail, and there never can be wanting some who distinguish desert; who will consider that no dictionary of a living tongue ever can be perfect, since, while it is hastening to publication, some words are budding, and some falling away; that a whole life cannot be spent upon syntax and etymology, and that even a whole life would not be sufficient; that he, whose design includes whatever language can express, must often speak of what he does not understand; that a writer will sometimes be hurried by eagerness to the end, and sometimes faint with weariness under a task, which Scaliger compares to the labours of the anvil and the mine; that what is obvious is not always known, and what is known is not always present; that sudden fits of inadvertency will surprise vigilance, slight avocations will seduce attention, and casual eclipses of the mind will darken learning; and that the writer shall often in vain trace his memory, at the moment of need, for that which yesterday he knew with intuitive readiness, and which will come uncalled into his thoughts to-morrow.

In this work, when it shall be found that much is omitted, let it not be forgotten that much likewise is performed; and though no book was ever spared out of tenderness to the author, and the world is little solicitous to know whence proceeded the faults of that which it condemns; yet it may gratify curiosity to inform it, that the English Dictionary was written with little assistance of the learned, and without any patronage of the great; not in the soft obscurities of retirement, or under the shelter of academick bowers, but amid inconvenience and distraction, in sickness and in sorrow. It may repress the triumph of malignant criticism to observe, that, if our language is not here fully displayed, I have only failed in an attempt which no human powers have hitherto completed. If the lexicons of ancient tongues, now immutably fixed, and comprised in a few volumes, be yet, after the toil of successive ages, inadequate and delusive; if the aggregated knowledge and co-operating diligence of the Italian academicians did not secure them from the censure of Beni; if the immoderate criticisms of France, when fifty years had been spent upon their work, were obliged to change its economy, and give their second edition another form,—I may surely be contented without the praise of perfection, which if I could obtain, in this gloom of solitude, what would it avail me? I have protracted my work till most of those, whom I wished to please, have sunk into the grave and success and miscarriage are empty sounds: I therefore dismiss it with frigid tranquillity, having little to fear or hope from censure or from praise.

TO HIS FIRST EDITION OF JOHNSON'S DICTIONARY.

THE Dictionary of Dr. Johnson has been rightly pronounced a wonderful achievement of genius and labour. Yet Dr. Johnson admitted, that, in forming it, he had not satisfied his own expectations; and, after a revision of it, he replied to a *friend, who had sent him additions too late to be inserted, that, if many readers had been as judicious, as diligent, and as communicative, the Dictionary would have been better. He probably, therefore, would not have scorned an augmentation or correction, though offered by one of less attainments than his friend, if offered with due respect.

This consideration supports, in some degree, the mind of the present editor. For, though he feels all the diffidence which most men would feel in occasionally questioning the authority of Dr. Johnson, he is induced to hope, that the warmest admirers of that incomparable man will not disparage the industry which he himself might perhaps have countenanced.

The fruits, such as they are, of the present editor's employment, will be found in an abundant supply of words, which have hitherto been omitted; in a rectification of many, which etymology, in particular, requires; and in exemplifying several, which are without illustration. These words are often the property of authors, the "†very dust of whose writings is gold;" of Pearson and of Barrow, whose names might very frequently have graced the pages of a national Dictionary; of Bacon and Raleigh, of Jeremy Taylor, of Milton, and Hammond, and Hall, and many others, whose words indeed have largely, but of which the stock is not exhausted, conveyed, in the example, "†some elegance of language, or some precept of prudence or piety." These words commend to notice many writers, also, who have been unjustly neglected or slightly examined; men, who have taught with energy the lessons of human life, and who have explored with accuracy the source of "§English undefiled." The poet, as well as the philosopher, of elder times, will here sanction some expressions, which, from their sound or significance, deserve to be rescued from oblivion. Indeed, without recourse to such assistance, much valuable ore must still be buried in the mine; the structure of words must sometimes remain undiscovered; and the coinage of many forcible terms be still unguardedly †imputed to the moderns.

It is an opinion of †Dryden, that the English language arrived to its highest perfection in Beaumont and Fletcher; and that "the words, which have since been taken in, are rather superfluous than ornamental." Few writers have afforded, to the present editor, so many passages of †illustration as these dramatists. But it will be found, that our language has certainly derived new graces from many succeeding authors.

"Words are the people's; yet there is a choice of them to be made." For this reason, the present editor has declined to admit many into the Dictionary; especially what are merely licenses of old comedy, and what was the fantastical cant during the great rebellion. Nor has he made an indiscriminate collection of our archaisms. With words from such sources, his pages might have been increased an hundred-fold. But he has not neglected the notice of some expressions, even in authors of little fame, which exhibit what in better writers might be sought in vain, and by which an interesting custom, or a valuable provincial phrase, is sometimes illustrated.

As he thus differs in opinion from those, who cannot allow the omission of any word in the language; so he has not been disposed to follow the advice of others, who would expunge innumerable words which Dr. Johnson has admitted. He has proposed to expunge none; except in a few instances, where no such word, it will be found, in reality exists.

In disturbing the etymology, and very rarely the definition, or in adding to either, his meaning has been to accommodate the reader, without violating the order of the original work; and therefore he has not placed the emendation at a distance from its object, or continued the mistake which it has been his endeavour to rectify. Words, thus altered, whether in a great or small degree, will be known by the typographical mark which follows them; and to others, which have hitherto wanted even a single instance of illustration; as well as to some, which present an example from a †prose-writer as well as a poet, or which are confirmed by a proof of higher authority than what is given; the same distinction is affixed. To the words newly produced another mark is subjoined. Among these, adverbs in ly, substantives in ness, and verbal nouns in ing, have been introduced without imitating the parsimony with which they have hitherto been exhibited. Nor will appellatives, derived from proper names, be thought intruders; since they have sometimes acquired a meaning so unconnected with their origin, as to demand explanation; and appellatives of a more general nature are agreeable to the regulation of Dr. Johnson himself, who admits a Pagan, though he has rejected a Quaker.

Of some mistaken references, or imperfect citations, which Dr. Johnson has given, the rectification is without specific notice; and of such improvements the number, no doubt, might have been much enlarged. But to note minutely all his extracts, would be perhaps a difficulty almost as insurmountable as to correct every mistake. The editions of his Dictionary have been compared; and there are many curious variations, especially from the first. That of his last revision, "†† in which he expunged some superfluities and corrected some mistakes, scattered here and there a remark," has been principally regarded; but not without attention to that, which has given a few posthumous additions.

That the value of the citations may be duly appreciated, the present editor intends to offer some notices of the authors cited; which will also chronologically, as well as critically, illustrate the history of our language. And that history of the language, which has been given by Dr. Johnson, will be augmented with many curious and some hitherto indited materials.

And now, admitting that Dr. Johnson's Dictionary is not without defect, let it be considered that a work of this kind must necessarily be defective; that in dictionaries, more than in other books, faults will be committed; because, as the great lexicographer has said, he who makes them must often write of what he does not understand. With him, however, rests the entire merit of a Plan, which other labourers in lexicography must regard with admiration and gratitude, however unable, individually, to complete it.

Thus the aim at universality, which Dr. Ash, since the publication of Johnson's Dictionary, has shown in his extensive and useful Vocabulary, has however failed in some particulars; and yet wants many sterling words. Nor has the Supplement of Mr. Mason to the great work of Johnson been received with much regard. For he professes, that he has little knowledge of those languages, without which etymological criticism cannot be employed. He has drawn from obscurity many colloquial licenses, indeed, but comparatively few expressions of dignity. Where he has been serviceable, it has been a pleasure to incorporate his labours. He had doubtless some talents for research; but he has lowered them by perpetually insulting the memory of Johnson, whom he brands with "muddiness of intellect." Not such have been the exertions of the Reverend Mr. Boucher; of which a specimen has been given to the public in the first letter of the alphabet, and which abundantly, as well as most learnedly, shows how much remains to be done, in order to have a perfect view of the English language.

Additions and corrections, which had been made by this gentleman, have been intrusted to the present editor; of which, as well as of other communications, made to him with great liberality and without solicitation, he will, in the Introduction to this work, give an explicit account.

The proprietors of this work have, with unsolicited kindness, procured, for the present editor's inspection, the papers of the late Mr. Horne Tooke, and his copy of Johnson's Dictionary, with some marginal remarks; the late Mr. Henshall's interleaved but slightly noted copy of the same; and the late Mr. Eyre's copy, with additional references in the margin. But these have yielded no great harvest of intelligence. What has been gained will be more fully detailed, with other obligations to his friends, from whom he must not here omit to mention that he has received some remarks of the late Mr. Malone, in the general Introduction to this work.

After all, what the present editor has done he considers but as dust in the balance, when weighed against the work of Dr. Johnson. He is content, if his countrymen shall admit, that he has contributed somewhat towards that which many hands will not exhaust; that his efforts, though imperfect, are not useless. And if any should severely insist, that he ought to have preserved so much caution through the work, as rarely to sink into negligence; and to have obtained so much knowledge of all its parts, as seldom to *fail by ignorance; he has only to hope, that their frequent disappointment may be consoled by the following words: "† He that endureth no faults in men's writings must only read his own, wherein, for the most part, all appeareth white. Quotation, mistakes, inadvertency, expedition, and human lapses, may make not only moles, but warts, in learned authors; who, notwithstanding, being judged by the capital matter, admit not of disparagement."

TODD'S INTRODUCTION

TO HIS FIRST EDITION OF JOHNSON'S DICTIONARY.

THE nature and design of the additions and alterations, which are made in the present publication of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, are explained in the preceding Advertisement. It remains to specify my obligations to others, in the preparation of the work; and to introduce to the reader's notice such other circumstances, connected with the progress of it, as it becomes me to state.

The first, and in my own opinion the most important, obligation which I have to acknowledge, is to James Boswell, Esq. of the Middle Temple, the son of the biographer of Johnson, the friend of the late Edmund Malone, and a zealous promoter of the cause of literature. Among the valuable books of Mr. Malone, consigned to the care of Mr. Boswell, there was a copy of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, interleaved, and bound in three volumes, in which Mr. Malone had "inserted a great number of additional words and examples omitted by Johnson." With the frankness, which distinguishes the real lover of learning, Mr. Boswell sent these volumes to me, of the existence of which I had not before known; allowing me, at the same time, to extract any of the observations, which Mr. Malone had made, for the purpose of the present work. The accuracy and diligence of Mr. Malone could not but render the business of examining his volumes very pleasing; nor fail to afford abundant service towards the labour in which I was employed. His statement, at the beginning of the first of the volumes, is this: "1052 manuscript remarks in the three volumes of this most valuable Dictionary: for the greater part I am answerable: those, to which D. is subscribed, were written by Samuel Dyer."—Of these additional words and examples, a large number is taken from the works of Bishop Hall in particular, and from those of other writers in the reigns of Elizabeth and her successor; most of which, in the course of my studies, had been long since selected also by myself; the fitness of which for my design, I was therefore proud to find corroborated by the judgement of Mr. Malone. That I have omitted many of his additions, I will not conceal; that I have, in particular cases, expressly summoned him to my aid, will be obvious: and that he would not have disdained the manner in which I have adopted any of his improvements, I am persuaded.

To the President and Fellows of Sion College, I am next to say, that, in like manner, I am indebted for an unsolicited offer of the use of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, belonging to their library; in the margins of which, references to authors for examples where several words have none, and also some new words with examples, are pointed out by the late Rev. Mr. Bagshaw, of Bromley, one of the friends of Dr. Johnson. But they are principally mere references, in number about 600, and chiefly to our theological writers; of which some agree with examples cited by Mr. Malone or myself, and some with others which have appeared in Mr. Mason's Supplement to Dr. Johnson's Dictionary. Etymological remarks are rarely found among these proofs of Mr. Bagshaw's diligence. By the perusal of the whole, however, I have been much gratified, as well as often confirmed in matters which had before excited hesitation.

For the sight of an interleaved copy of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, which belonged to the late Rev. Mr. Henshall, I have been obliged to Messrs. Longman and Co., booksellers. The copy is formed into four volumes: that, which ends with the letter C, contains the most of his fanciful, however learned, annotations: the rest are thinly sown with remarks. I am not aware of having derived any advantage from this favour.

From the same gentlemen I received another copy of the Dictionary, filled with marginal remarks by the late Rev. Mr. Eyre. Though these remarks, like Mr. Bagshaw's, are mostly references; and though they are references principally to recent publications, as reviews and magazines, of which, at the beginning of the book, Mr. Eyre gives a list; as plays and novels, also, of our own days; one cannot but admire the indefatigable industry of the scholar, in crowding the margins with words or sentences, intended (I should suppose in very many instances) rather for future consideration, than for decided addition. Had the same attention been paid to our old authors, the labour of Mr. Eyre would have been invaluable. Probably, not having access to many writers of this description, Mr. Eyre availed himself of the less useful information within his reach; and bestowed acute, as well as diligent, investigation upon objects not always deserving it. Sometimes, though rarely, he has given a citation from a book of elder times; a citation generally admissible. The writer of a future dictionary may, perhaps, often betake himself to this storehouse of information. What I have scrupled to adopt may, at no distant period, demand, on increasing authority, admission into an English dictionary; and eccentric terms, which have been employed by questionable writers to express common conceptions, may perhaps lose their novelty, or their quaintness, in sage and solemn usage.

There remains to be expressed another obligation to these gentlemen for the use of several books and papers, which were the property of the late Mr. Horne Tooke. Of these in due order. The first has been a copy of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary in two folio volumes, with marginal notes; in which there are not fifty that can be of service to any lexicographer, (as I perhaps mistakingly conceive,) who is in possession of the Diversions of Purley. This copy had been purchased at the sale of Mr. Tooke's library, and is said to have been intended, by the purchaser, to be the basis of a new English dictionary. By the purchaser, however, it was consigned to Messrs. Longman & Co.; and the publick will with me lament, that any intention should have been impeded, of which the furtherance might at once have crushed my humble attempt. At the beginning of this copy there are the names of some authors entered; in the Preface there are some remarks, not of the most liberal character; and to the History of the Language, and to the Grammar, there is no addition of importance. The Hermes of Mr. Harris, another of Mr. Tooke's books, abounding with his notes of haughtiest mood, has been of no use whatever to my purpose. His folio copy of Beaumont and Fletcher, with words marked in the margins, (an employment in which he was assisted by a distinguished living character,) has been of great service to me; being the same edition as that from which my own remarks had been formed, and thus, by easy reference, confirming my choice with respect to dubious expressions, as well as pointing out others, which I had overpassed. The Gothic and Saxon Dictionary of Lye, edited by Mr. Manning, was also among the printed volumes of Mr. Tooke intrusted to me; upon which the manuscript remarks afforded no intelligence of consequence. I come next to the observations upon our language, which Mr. Tooke left in manuscript books; at least such as I have examined. These were fifteen quarto books, containing the words of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary in regular order, with some additions, more particularly adverbs and substantives derived from adjectives; but without example, or other notice than the mere entry of the word. This employment occasionally suggested to me the introduction of such words into the dictionary, especially when I could support them by example. And therefore to this employment of Mr. Tooke I gladly acknowledge myself indebted. Six quarto books, containing words arranged according to terminations, as in and, ard, ed, est, &c., have been without use to me, however they might have been intended for some valuable purpose by Mr. Tooke. Of a quarto, entitled Roots, which are Latin verbs, with English words stated to be derived from them, I found no occasion to avail myself. In another, entitled Gothick Roots, consisting of not many written pages, there was little to be observed, which was not already in Lye. Out of three quartos, entitled Index Expurgatorius, or a list of such words as Mr. Tooke would have discharged from Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, I have made no selection; some, which he rejects, being supported by no mean authority; and some, being local, deserving to be retained. I think that in the letter A the arbitrary abolitions amount to about 800. Besides these books, there was a great variety of cards, upon which were written terminations entered in the quarto volumes, and other intended verbal arrangements. There was also one set, denouncing certain words as false English,* and arranged according to terminations, which I have printed at the close of this Dictionary; both as it is a specimen of the employment which I have been describing, and as a criticism rarely to be questioned.—Such is the account of the papers, left by Mr. Tooke, which I have seen; which indicated, I think, that he had once intended to compile an English dictionary. If more had been left to show that he had other illustrations to offer, not dissimilar to those which his Divisions of Purley had communicated, his friends would surely not have suffered them to slumber in inglorious silence. For that work, in which he has so acutely illustrated an ancient system, he has the thanks of every sound philologist; though it has been well remarked, that he has not laid in it, as he imagined, the foundation for future philosophers.

I am now to offer my thanks to the Rev. Archdeacon Churton, and the Rev. J. B. Blakeway; by whose remarks, communicated without solicitation, and without conditions, I have been, in several instances, materially assisted: to John Nichols, Esq. for the perusal of papers, illustrating our language, which were written by the late Dr. Pegge, and which offered, though mostly interwoven into his own publications, a gleaming or two to be gathered: to Roger Wilbraham, Esq. for the use of some uncommon books in his possession and for some pertinent observations: and to Martin Whish, Esq. of whose attention, though directing me not seldom to what my own researches had also marked, I cannot express too grateful a sense, when I consider the largeness of the communications, and the liberality with which they were made. Some notices have been sent by others, whose good intentions I respect, in number and importance too inconsiderable to require further acknowledgement. Nor have I been without obligation, in the progress of my employment, to criticisms which wanted, as well as to those which possessed, the writer's name; in which, on the one hand, much wit has been employed upon what are justly termed my feeble exertions; and, on the other, indignation has hurled its thunderbolts at my presumption; in which pretended illustrations and detections of mistake (penned in the bewitching hours of self-delusion) have been also proposed: which, upon examination, have only discovered how liable we all are to be deceived, and how much it behoves the maker or augmentor of a dictionary not always to rely implicitly upon proffered kindness, nor wholly to disregard the oppositions of sportive, or malicious ingenuity.

That there may soon be new makers of an English dictionary, it is warrantable to conjecture, knowing, as I do, that other gentlemen have bestowed attention upon the subject; the incorporation of whose services, not altogether free from conditions, it was beyond my power, if it had been my wish, after my plan was formed, to make. The treasures which now remain in their own management, undispersed, may therefore, if the owners choose, be laid before the publick, without intermixture, and without omission.

The History of the English Language I have augmented with some new materials. To the Grammar I have added Notes, which are principally illustrative of orthography, and of the etymological system so powerfully recalled to modern notice by Mr. Tooke; to which are subjoined the grammatical remarks of Mr. Tyrwhitt upon our ancient language. For the convenience of the volumes the Grammar has its place in the last. After it follows a List of Authors; of whom many perhaps might be considered too obscure to have been formerly cited in the Dictionary, if it could be denied, in the words of Johnson, that "the riches of the English tongue are much greater than they are commonly supposed; that many useful and valuable books lie buried in shops and libraries unknown and unexamined, unless some lucky compiler opens them by chance, and finds an easy spoil of wit and learning." Of old authors, as of old words, let no one make too hasty a rejection. Sarcasm may expose its impotence, as well as ignorance, in arraigning either; unaccustomed to observe that from the one (the partially "unknown and unexamined") our best writers have occasionally not disdained to draw wisdom; and that with the other they have warranted the use of terms, which the jeer of modern hypercriticism would discard. It may be easy, though it is not "so pleasant without scurrility," if I may use Sir Nathaniel's phrase, to present both words and sentences, with the juxtaposition of a quaint title, in a manner so detached as to excite no favourable opinion of the book, or rather to destroy all belief that it possesses any power of conveying knowledge. I might have omitted some citations from modern writers. But the canons yet remain to be promulged, by which the extremes of opposite tastes are to be settled. The precise period, at which antiquity is to be regarded as a rule, is not yet determined: the standard[§] inclines to remove to the distance of a century and a half; another may, with as good reason, fix it three centuries backwards; and another six.[†] May we then expect decision upon these points from a society for refining the language, and fixing its standard? Alas! Johnson himself has told us, that "the edicts of an English Academy would probably be read by many only that they might be sure to disobey them!"

For the paucity of curious or satisfactory information, which my additions and alterations exhibit, and for the abundance of inaccuracies and faults which have escaped my care, I may not, I hope, solicit the pardon of the candid reader in vain. I should indeed have been thrown into irrecoverable confusion and dismay, in reconsidering what I have done, if, for an humble attendant, also, there were not consolation in the words of the master, which first accompanied the fourth edition of his Dictionary:—

"Many are the works of human industry, which to begin and finish are hardly granted to the same man.

[* The list of words pronounced by Mr. Tooke to be "false English," Dr. Johnson's "History of the English Language," and his "Grammar of the English Tongue," are not contained in this Dictionary; but the "List of Authors," is inserted at the end of the volume.—Editor.]

He that undertakes to compile a dictionary, undertakes that, which, if it comprehends the full extent of his design, he knows himself unable to perform. Yet his labours, though deficient, may be *useful, and, with the hope of this inferior praise, he must incite his activity, and solace his weariness.

"Perfection is unattainable, but nearer and nearer approaches may be made; and, finding my Dictionary about to be reprinted, I have endeavoured, by a revision, to make it less reprehensible. I will not deny, that I found many parts requiring emendation, and many more capable of improvement. Many faults I have corrected, some superfluities I have taken away, and some deficiencies I have supplied. I have methodized some parts that were disordered, and illuminated some that were obscure. Yet the changes or additions bear a very small proportion to the whole. The critic will now have less to object, but the student who has bought any of the former copies need not repent; he will not, without nice collation, perceive how they differ; and usefulness seldom depends upon little things.

"For negligence or deficiency, I have perhaps not need of more apology than the nature of the work will furnish. I have left that inaccurate which never was made exact, and that imperfect which never was completed."—

Of the present augmented edition of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary the proprietors, as I am informed, intend to publish, as soon as possible, in the octavo size, an abridgement; in which I have respectfully, and for unanswerable reasons, declined any concern whatever. And I now relinquish altogether the labours of the lexicography, with the hope that my omissions and imperfections may stimulate the accurate and the judicious so to form a dictionary of our language, as not to subject it to any of the animadversions which will be made on my attempt.

TO HIS SECOND EDITION, PUBLISHED IN 1827.

THE Dictionary of Dr. Johnson, with my additions, having been acceptable to the publick, a reimpression of it has been required. I have, in consequence, been asked to render any assistance to the reimpression which might be in my power. What I have been able to do has been done with cheerfulness, in gratitude for the reception of my former extensive labours. Removed by my present residence from the easy reach of that abundance of books, and conversation of men of letters, which then aided my inquiries, I yet have offered (though in number together not more, perhaps, than between two and three thousand) some emendations and some new words. These have been the fruits of leisure in a retired situation; and for these, with the exception of a few remarks from one learned friend, I have been indebted almost wholly to books in my own collection.

Additions, indeed, have been suggested, in separate forms, to my first edition of this Dictionary by other gentlemen. Of such labours I am quite sure that I could have no right to avail myself further than by a correction of a very few pardonable errors; and, with respect to opinions in which they may have been pleased to differ from me, I do not think myself required to answer them. May these learned persons be more useful than I can be. Still they will find that much is yet to be done. "Daily both new words," as an ancient lexicographer well observes, "are invented, and books still found that make a new supply of old." Our many excellent writers, during the reigns of Elizabeth and James the First, will yet abundantly exemplify the latter part of this remark. And to the selection of examples, as well as to etymology, and to definition, and to orthography, and to accentuation, the industry and judgement of many yet remain to be directed, divided, as they ought to be, into distinct studies, ere we can hope to see a beautiful whole, a standard of pure and exact phraseology. Our provincialisms, too, solicit especial notice; as I have found by a residence of six years in the north of England, which has occasioned the introduction into the following pages of more northern phrases than are in the former edition; in the description of which I am generally confirmed by the entertaining and useful Glossaries of the Craven Dialect and of Mr. Brockett, published within the last three years; and to them I always refer with pleasure. To the very curious Glossary, also, of Cheshire Words, by my learned friend, Roger Wilbraham, Esq. I have been much indebted. The recent Collection of Suffolk Words, by Major Moor, has likewise occasionally strengthened an observation. The same may be said of West Country Words, published in 1825 by Mr. Jennings; to whose candour, in his remark upon the first edition of this Dictionary, (in which he suggests improvement and addition that must, however, be the work of many, I repeat, and not of an individual,) I am also obliged: for he says, "that, although the work will still admit of considerable addition and improvement, it contains, in his judgement, the greatest mass of information on the subject of our own language at present extant."

WALKER'S PREFACE

TO HIS PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY.

FEW subjects have of late years more employed the pens of every class of critics, than the improvement of the English language. The greatest abilities in the nation have been exerted in cultivating and reforming it; nor have a thousand minor critics been wanting to add their mite of amendment to their native tongue. Johnson, whose large mind and just taste made him capable of enriching and adorning the language with original composition, has condescended to the drudgery of disentangling, explaining, and arranging it, and left a lasting monument of his ability, labour, and patience: and Dr. Lowth, the politest scholar of the age, has veiled his superiority in his short Introduction to English Grammar. The ponderous folio has gravely vindicated the rights of analogy; and the light, ephemeral sheet of news has corrected errors in grammar, as well as in politics, by slyly marking them in Italicks.

Nor has the improvement stopped here. While Johnson and Lowth have been insensibly operating on the orthography and construction of our language, its pronunciation has not been neglected. The importance of a consistent and regular pronunciation was too obvious to be overlooked; and the want of this consistency and regularity has induced several ingenious men to endeavour at a reformation; who, by exhibiting the regularities of pronunciation, and pointing out its analogies, have reclaimed some words that were not irrecoverably fixed in a wrong sound, and prevented others from being perverted by ignorance or caprice.

Among those writers who deserve the first praise on this subject is Mr. Elphinston; who, in his Principles of the English Language, has reduced the chaos to a system; and, by a deep investigation of the analogies of our tongue, has laid the foundation of a just and regular pronunciation.

After him, Dr. Kenrick contributed a portion of improvement by his Rhetorical Dictionary; in which the words are divided into syllables as they are pronounced, and figures placed over the vowels, to indicate their different sounds. But this gentleman has rendered his dictionary extremely imperfect, by entirely omitting a great number of words of doubtful and difficult pronunciation—those very words for which a dictionary of this kind would be most consulted.

To him succeeded Mr. Sheridan, who not only divided the words into syllables, and placed figures over the vowels as Dr. Kenrick had done, but, by spelling these syllables as they are pronounced, seemed to complete the idea of a pronouncing dictionary, and to leave but little expectation of future improvement. It must, indeed, be confessed, that Mr. Sheridan's dictionary is greatly superior to every other that preceded it; and his method of conveying the sound of words, by spelling them as they are pronounced, is highly rational and useful. But here sincerity obliges me to stop. The numerous instances I have given of impropriety, inconsistency, and want of acquaintance with the analogies of the language, sufficiently show how imperfect I think his dictionary is upon the whole, and what ample room was left for attempting another, that might better answer the purpose of a guide to pronunciation.

The last writer on this subject is Mr. Nares, who, in his Elements of Orthoëpy, has shown a clearness of method, and an extent of observation, which deserve the highest encomiums. His preface alone proves him an elegant writer, as well as a philosophical observer of language: and his Alphabetical Index, referring near five thousand words to the rules for pronouncing them, is a new and useful method of treating the subject: but he seems, on many occasions, to have mistaken the best usage, and to have paid too little attention to the first principles of pronunciation.

* See Principles, No. 124, 126, 129, 386, 454, 462, 479, 480, 530; and the words Assume, Collect, Covetous, Donative, Ephemeræ, Satiety, &c., and the inseparable preposition dis.

Thus I have ventured to give my opinion of my rivals and competitors, and I hope without envy or self-conceit. Perhaps it would have been policy in me to have been silent on this head, for fear of putting the publick in mind that others have written on the subject as well as myself: but this is a narrow policy, which, under the colour of tenderness to others, is calculated to raise ourselves at their expense. A writer, who is conscious he deserves the attention of the publick, (and unless he is thus conscious he ought not to write,) must not only wish to be compared with those who have gone before him, but will promote the comparison, by informing his readers what others have done, and on what he founds his pretensions to a preference; and, if this be done with fairness and without acrimony, it can be no more inconsistent with modesty, than it is with honesty and plain dealing.

The work I have offered on the subject has, I hope, added something to the publick stock: it not only exhibits the principles of pronunciation on a more extensive plan than others have done, divides the words into syllables, and marks the sounds of the vowels, like Dr. Kenrick, spells the words as they are pronounced, like Mr. Sheridan, and directs the inspector to the rule by the word, like Mr. Nares; but, where words are subject to different pronunciations, it shows the reasons from analogy for each, produces authorities for one side and the other, and points out the pronunciation which is preferable. In short, I have endeavoured to unite the science of Mr. Elphinston, the method of Mr. Nares, and the general utility of Mr. Sheridan; and, to add to these advantages, have given critical observations on such words as are subject to a diversity of pronunciation, and have invited the inspector to decide according to analogy and the best usage.

But to all works of this kind there lies a formidable objection; which is, that the pronunciation of a language is necessarily indefinite and fugitive, and that all endeavours to delineate or settle it are in vain. Dr. Johnson, in his grammar prefixed to his dictionary, says: "Most of the writers of English grammar have given long tables of words pronounced otherwise than they are written, and seem not sufficiently to have considered, that, of English, as of all living tongues, there is a double pronunciation; one cursory and colloquial, the other regular and solemn. The cursory pronunciation is always vague and uncertain, being made different in different mouths, by negligence, unskilfulness, or affectation. The solemn pronunciation, though by no means immutable and permanent, is yet always less remote from the orthography, and less liable to capricious innovation. They have, however, generally formed their tables according to the cursory speech of those with whom they happened to converse, and, concluding that the whole nation combines to vitiate language in one manner, have often established the jargon of the lowest of the people as the model of speech. For pronunciation, the best general rule is, to consider those as the most elegant speakers, who deviate least from the written words."

Without any derogation from the character of Dr. Johnson, it may be asserted, that in these observations we do not perceive that justness and accuracy of thinking, for which he is so remarkable. It would be doing great injustice to him, to suppose that he meant to exclude all possibility of conveying the actual pronunciation of many words that depart manifestly from their orthography, or of those that are written alike, and pronounced differently, and inversely. He has marked these differences with great propriety himself, in many places of his dictionary; and it is to be regretted that he did not extend these remarks farther. It is impossible, therefore, he could suppose, that, because the almost imperceptible difference between the initial accented syllables of money and monitor, or the final unaccented syllables of finite and infinite, could not be sufficiently marked upon paper. Cannot we show that cellar, a vault, and i etuler, one who sells, have exactly the same sound : or that the monosyllable full and the first syllable of fulminate are sounded differently, because there are some words in which solemnity will authorize a different shade of pronunciation from familiarity? Besides, that colloquial pronunciation which is perfect is so much the language of solemn speaking, that, perhaps, there is no more difference than between the same picture painted to be viewed near and at a distance. The symmetry in both is exactly the same; and the distinction lies only in the colouring. The English language, in this respect, seems to have a great superiority over the French, which pronounces many letters in the poetical and solemn style, that are wholly silent in the prosaic and familiar. But if a solemn and familiar pronunciation really exists in our language, is it not the business of a grammarian to mark both? And, if he cannot point out the precise sound of unaccented syllables, (for these only are liable to obscurity,) he may, at least, give those sounds which approach the nearest, and by this means become a little more useful than those who so liberally leave every thing to the ear and taste of the speaker.

The truth is, Dr. Johnson seems to have had a confused idea of the distinctness and indistinctness with which, on solemn or familiar occasions, we sometimes pronounce the unaccented vowels; and, with respect to these, it must be owned, that his remarks are not entirely without foundation. The English language, with respect to its pronunciation, is evidently divisible into accented and unaccented sounds. The accented syllables, by being pronounced with greater force than the unaccented, have their vowels as clearly and distinctly sounded as any given note in music; while the unaccented vowels, for want of the stress, are apt to slide into an obscurity of sound, which, though sufficiently distinguishable to the ear, cannot be so definitely marked out to the eye by other sounds as those vowels that are under the accent. Thus some of the vowels, when neither under the accent, nor closed by a consonant, have a longer or a shorter, an opener or a closer sound, according to the solemnity or familiarity, the deliberation or rapidity of our delivery. This will be perceived in the sound of the e in emotion,* of the o in obedience, and of the u in monument. In the hasty pronunciation of common speaking, the e in emotion is often shortened, as if spelt im-motion; the o in obedience shortened and obscured, as if written ub-be-de-ence; and the u in monument changed into e, as if written mon-ne-ment; while the deliberate and elegant sound of these vowels is the long open sound they have, when the accent is on them, in equal, over, and unit; but a, when unaccented, seems to have no such diversity; it has generally a short, obscure sound, whether ending a syllable or closed by a consonant. Thus the a in able has its definite and distinct sound; but the same letter in tolerate goes into an obscure, indefinite sound approaching the short u; nor can any solemnity or deliberation give it the long open sound it has in the first word. Thus, by distinguishing vowels into their accented and unaccented sounds, we are enabled to see clearly what Dr. Johnson saw but obscurely; and by this distinction entirely to answer the objection.

Equally indefinite and uncertain is his general rule, that those are to be considered as the most elegant speakers who deviate least from the written words. It is certain, where custom is equal, this ought to take place; and if the whole body of respectable English speakers were equally divided in their pronunciation of the word busy, one half pronouncing it beu-ze,† and the other half biz-ze, that the former ought to be accounted the most elegant speakers; but, till this is the case, the latter pronunciation, though a gross deviation from orthography, will still be esteemed the most elegant. Dr. Johnson's general rule, therefore, can only take place where custom has not plainly decided; but, unfortunately for the English language, its orthography and pronunciation are so widely different, that Dr. Watts and Dr. Jones lay it down as a maxim in their Treatises on Spelling, that all words, which can be sounded different ways, must be written according to that sound which is most distant from the true pronunciation; and consequently, in such a language, a Pronouncing Dictionary must be of essential use.

But still it may be objected to such an undertaking, that the fluctuation of pronunciation is so great as to render all attempts to settle it useless. What will it avail us, it may be said, to know the pronunciation of the present day, if, in a few years, it will be altered? And how are we to know even what the present pronunciation is, when the same words are often differently pronounced by different speakers, and those perhaps of equal numbers and reputation? To this it may be answered, that the fluctuation of our language, with respect to its pronunciation, seems to have been greatly exaggerated. Except a very few single words, which are generally noticed in the following dictionary, and the words where e comes before r, followed by another consonant, as merchant, service, &c., the pronunciation of the language is probably in the same state in which it was a century ago; and, had the same attention been then paid to it as now, it is not likely even that change would have happened. The same may be observed of those words which are differently pronounced by different speakers: if the analogies of the language had been better understood, it is scarcely conceivable that so many words in polite usage would have a diversity of pronunciation, which is at once so ridiculous and embarrassing; nay, perhaps it may be with confidence asserted, that if the analogies of the language were sufficiently known, and so near at hand as to be applicable on inspection to every word, that not only many words which are wavering between contrary usages would be settled in their true sound, but that many words, which are fixed by custom to an improper pronunciation, would, by degrees, grow regular and analogical; and those which are so already would be secured in their purity, by a knowledge of their regularity and analogy.

But the utility of a work of this kind is not confined to those parts of language where the impropriety is gross and palpable; besides such imperfections in pronunciation as disgust every ear not accustomed to them, there are a thousand insensible deviations, in the more minute parts of language, as the unaccented syllables may be called, which do not strike the ear so forcibly as to mark any direct impropriety in particular words, but occasion only such a general imperfection as gives a bad impres-

§ The old and new Ardis, with all the various dialects, must have occasioned infinite irregularity in the pronunciation of the Greek tongue; and, if we may judge of the Latin pronunciation by the ancient inscriptions, it was little less various and irregular than the Greek. Aulus Gellius tells us, that Nigidius, a grammarian who lived a little more than a century before him, acuted the first syllable of Valeri; but, says he, "si quis nunc Valerium appellans in casu vocandi secundum id præceptum Nigidii acuter primam, non aberit quin rideatur."—Whoever now should place the accent on the first syllable of Valerius, when a vocative case, according to the precept of Nigidius, would set every body a laughing. Even that highly polished language, the French, if we may believe a writer in the Encyclopédie, is little less irregular in this respect than our own.

"Il est arrivé," says he, "par les altérations qui se succèdent rapidement dans la manière de prononcer, et les corrections qui s'introduisent lentement dans la manière d'écrire, que la prononciation et l'écriture ne marchent point ensemble, et que quoiqu'il y ait chez les peuples les plus policés de l'Europe, des sociétés d'hommes de lettres chargés des les modérer, des les accorder, et des les rapprocher de la même ligne, elles se trouvent enfin à une distance inconcevable; ensuite que de deux choses don. l'une n'a été imaginée dans son origine, que pour représenter fidèlement l'autre, celle-ci ne diffère guère moins de celle-là, que la portrait de la même personne peints dans deux âges très-éloignés. Enfin l'inconvénient s'est accru à un tel excès qu'on n'ose plus y remédier. On prononce une langue, on écrit une autre; et l'on s'accoutume tellement pendant le reste de la vie à cette bisarrerie qui a fait verser tant de larmes dans l'enfance, que si l'on renonçoit à sa mauvaise orthographe pour une plus voisine de la prononciation, on ne reconnoitroit plus la langue parlée sous cette nouvelle combinaison de caractères. S'il y en a qui ne pourroient se succéder sans une grande fatigue pour l'organe, ou ils ne se rencontrent point, ou ils ne durent pas. Ils sont échappés de la langue par l'euphonie, cette loi puissante, qui agit continuellement et universellement sans égard pour l'étymologie et ses défenseurs, et qui tend sans intermission à amener des êtres qui ont les mêmes organes, le même idiôme, les mêmes mouvemens prescrits, à-peu-près à la même prononciation. Les causes dont l'action n'est point interrompue, deviennent toujours les plus fortes avec les tems, quelque foibles qu'elles soient en elles-mêmes, et il n'y a presque pas une seule voyelle, une seule diphthongue, une seule consonne dont la valeur soit tellement constante, que l'euphonie n'en puisse disposer, soit en altérant le son, soit en le supprimant."

I shall not decide upon the justness of these complaints, but must observe, that a worse picture could scarcely be drawn of the English, or the most barbarous language of Europe. Indeed, a degree of versatility seems involved in the very nature of language, and is one of those evils left by Providence for man to correct: a love of order, and the utility of regularity, will always incline him to confine this versatility within as narrow bounds as possible.

tion upon the whole. Speakers with these imperfections pass very well in common conversation; but when they are required to pronounce with emphasis, and for that purpose to be more distinct and definite in their utterance, here their ear fails them: they have been accustomed only to loose, cursory speaking, and, for want of firmness of pronunciation, are like those painters who draw the muscular exertions of the human body without any knowledge of anatomy. This is one reason, perhaps, why we find the elocution of so few people agreeable when they read or speak to an assembly, while so few offend us by their utterance in common conversation. A thousand faults lie concealed in a miniature, which a microscope brings to view; and it is only by pronouncing on a larger scale, as public speaking may be called, that we prove the propriety of our elocution. As, therefore, there are certain deviations from analogy which are not at any rate tolerable, there are others which only, as it were, tarnish the pronunciation, and make it less brilliant and agreeable. There are few who have turned their thoughts on this subject, without observing that they sometimes pronounce the same word or syllable in a different manner; and, as neither of these manners offends the ear, they are at a loss to which they shall give the preference; but, as one must necessarily be more agreeable to the analogy of the language than the other, a display of these analogies, in a dictionary of this kind, will immediately remove this uncertainty; and in this view of the variety we shall discover a fitness in one mode of speaking, which will give a firmness and security to our pronunciation, from a confidence that it is founded on reason, and the general tendency of the language. See Principles, No. 530, 547, 551, &c.

But, alas! reasoning on language, however well founded, may be all overturned by a single quotation from Horace:

"Quem penes arbitrium est, et jus et norma loquendi."

This, it must be owned, is a succinct way of ending the controversy; and, by virtue of this argument, we may become critics in language, without the trouble of studying it: not that I would be thought, in the most distant manner, to deny that custom is the sovereign arbiter of language; far from it. I acknowledge its authority, and know there is no appeal from it. I wish only to dispute, where this arbiter has not decided; for, if once custom speak out, however absurdly, I sincerely acquiesce in its sentence.

But what is this custom, to which we must so implicitly submit? Is it the usage of the multitude of speakers, whether good or bad? This has never been asserted by the most sanguine abettors of its authority. Is it the usage of the studios in schools and colleges, with those of the learned professions, or that of those who, from their elevated birth or station, give laws to the refinements and elegancies of a court? To confine propriety to the latter, which is too often the case, seems an injury to the former; who, from their very profession, appear to have a natural right to a share, at least, in the legislation of language, if not to an absolute sovereignty. The polished attendants on a throne are as apt to depart from simplicity in language, as in dress and manners; and novelty, instead of custom, is too often the jus et norma loquendi of a court.

Perhaps an attentive observation will lead us to conclude, that the usage which ought to direct us is neither of these we have been enumerating, taken singly, but a sort of compound ratio of all three. Neither a finical pronunciation of the court, nor a pedantick Græcism of the schools, will be denominated respectable usage, till a certain number of the general mass of speakers have acknowledged them; nor will a multitude of common speakers authorize any pronunciation which is reprobated by the learned and polite.

As those sounds, therefore, which are the most generally received among the learned and polite, as well as the bulk of speakers, are the most legitimate, we may conclude that a majority of two of these states ought always to concur, in order to constitute what is called good usage.

But though custom, when general, is commonly well understood, there are several states and degrees of it which are exceedingly obscure and equivocal; and the only method of knowing the extent of custom in these cases seems to be an inspection of those dictionaries which professedly treat of pronunciation. We have now so many works of this kind, that the general current of custom, with respect to the sound of words, may be collected from them with almost as much certainty as the general sense of words from Johnson. An exhibition of the opinions of orthoëpists about the sound of words always appeared to me a very rational method of determining what is called custom. This method I have adopted in the following work; and, if I have sometimes dissented from the majority, it has been either from a persuasion of being better informed of what was the actual custom of speaking, or from a partiality to the evident analogies of the language.

And here I must entreat the candid reader to make every reasonable allowance for the freedom with which I have criticised other writers on this subject, and particularly Mr. Sheridan. As a man, a gentleman, and a scholar, I knew Mr. Sheridan, and respected him; and think every lover of elocution owes him a tribute of thanks for his unwearied addresses to the publick, to rouse them to the study of the delivery of their native tongue. But this tribute, however just, does not exempt him from examination. His credit with the world necessarily subjects him to animadversion, because the errors of such a writer are dangerous in proportion to his reputation: this has made me zealous to remark his inaccuracies, but not without giving my reasons; nor have I ever taken advantage of such faults as may be called inadvertencies.* On the same principles I have ventured to criticise Dr. Johnson,† whose friendship and advice I was honoured with, whose memory I love, and whose intellectual powers impress me with something like religious veneration and awe. I do not pretend to be exempt from faults myself. In a work like the present, it would be a miracle to escape them; nor have I the least idea of deciding, as judge, in a case of so much delicacy and importance as the pronunciation of a whole people; I have only assumed the part of an advocate to plead the cause of consistency and analogy; and, where custom is either silent or dubious, to tempt the lovers of their language to incline to the side of propriety: so that my design is principally to give a kind of history of pronunciation, and a register of its present state; and, where the authorities of dictionaries or speakers are found to differ, to give such a display of the analogies of the language as may enable every inspector to decide for himself.

With respect to the explanation of words, except in very few instances, I have scrupulously followed Dr. Johnson. His Dictionary has been deemed lawful plunder by every subsequent lexicographer; and so servilely has it been copied, that such words as he must have omitted merely by mistake, as predilection, respectable, descriptive, sulky, inimical, interference, and many others, are neither in Mr. Sheridan's, Dr. Kenrick's, nor several other dictionaries.

* The inspector will be pleased to take notice, that my observations on Mr. Sheridan's dictionary relate to the first edition, published in his life-time, and the second, some time after his death; whatever alterations may have been made by his subsequent editors, I am totally unacquainted with.

WALKER'S ADVERTISEMENT

TO THE FOURTH EDITION OF HIS DICTIONARY.

THE rapid sale of the third edition of this Dictionary called upon me for a fourth, at a time of life, and in a state of health, little compatible with the drudgery and attention necessary for the execution of it: but, as I expected such a call, I was not unmindful of whatever might tend to render it still more worthy of the acceptance of the public; and therefore collected many words, which, though not found in dictionaries, were constantly to be met with in polite and literary conversation, and which were well deserving of a place in the language as soon as written authorities could be produced for them. Some of these authorities I have produced, and have left others to the attention of those who have more leisure and better health. In the midst of the impression of the present work, I met with Mason's Supplement to Johnson, and found several words worthy of insertion, but have carefully acknowledged the obligation; and take this opportunity of thanking that gentleman for the benefit I have derived from his Supplement, which I think, if continued, admirably calculated for the improvement and stability of the language.

But, as the great object of the present Dictionary was pronunciation, I was very solicitous to be as accurate as possible on this point, and therefore neglected no opportunity of informing myself where I was in the least doubtful, and of correcting myself where there was the least shadow of an error. These occasions, however, were not very numerous. To a man born, as I was, within a few miles of the capital, living in the capital almost my whole life, and exercising myself there in public speaking for many years; to such a person, if to any one, the true pronunciation of the language must be very familiar: and to this familiarity I am indebted for the security I have felt in deciding upon the sounds of several syllables, which nothing but an infantine pronunciation could determine. If I may borrow an allusion from musick, I might observe, that there is a certain tune in every language, to which the ear of a native is set, and which often decides on the preferable pronunciation, though entirely ignorant of the reasons for it.

But this vernacular instinct, as it may be called, has been seconded by a careful investigation of the analogies of the language. Accent and quantity, the great essentials of pronunciation, are seldom mistaken by people of education in the capital; but the great bulk of the nation, and those who form the most important part of it, are without these advantages, and therefore want such a guide to direct them as is here offered. Even polite and literary people, who speak only from the ear, will find that this organ will, in a thousand instances, prove but a very uncertain guide, without a knowledge of those principles by which the ear itself is insensibly directed, and which, having their origin in the nature of language, operate with steadiness and regularity in the midst of the feeblest affectation and caprice. It can scarcely be supposed that the most experienced speaker has heard every word in the language, and the whole circle of sciences, pronounced exactly as it ought to be: and, if this be the case, he must sometimes have recourse to the principles of pronunciation, when his ear is either uninformed or unfaithful. These principles are those general laws of articulation which determine the character, and fix the boundaries of every language; as in every system of speaking, however irregular, the organs must necessarily fall into some common mode of enunciation, or the purpose of Providence in the gift of speech would be absolutely defeated. These laws, like every other object of philosophical inquiry, are only to be traced by an attentive observation and enumeration of particulars; and, when these particulars are sufficiently numerous to form a general rule, an axiom in pronunciation is acquired. By an accumulation of these axioms, and an analogical comparison of them with each other, we discover the deviations of language where custom has varied, and the only clew to guide us where custom is either indeterminate or obscure.

Thus, by a view of the words ending in ity or ety, I find the accent invariably placed on the preceding syllable, as in diver'sity, congru'ity, &c. On a closer inspection, I find every vowel in this antepenultimate syllable, when no consonant intervenes, pronounced long, as de'ity, pi'e'ty, &c.; a nearer observation shows me, that, if a consonant intervene, every vowel in this syllable but u contracts itself, and is pronounced short, as se'verity, curi'osity, impu'nity, &c., and therefore that chastity and obscenity ought to be pronounced with the penultimate vowel short, and not as in chaste and obscene, as we frequently hear them. I find, too, that even u contracts itself before two consonants, as cur'vity, taciturn'ity, &c., and that scarcity and rarity (for whose irregularity good reasons may be given) are the only exceptions to this rule throughout the language. And thus we have a series of near seven hundred words, the accentuation of which, as well as the quantity of the accented vowel, are reduced to two or three simple rules.

The same uniformity of accentuation and quantity may be observed in the first syllable of those words which have the accent on the third, as dem-on'stra-tion, dim-i-nu'tion, lu-cu-bra'tion,* &c., where we evidently perceive a stress on the first syllable shortening every vowel but u, and this in every word throughout the language, except where two consonants follow the u, as in cur-vi-lin'e-ar; or where two vowels follow the consonant that succeeds any other vowel in the first syllable, as de-ri-a-tion; or, lastly, where the word is evidently of our own composition, as re-con-vey': but as u in the first syllable of a word, having the accent on the third, has the same tendency to length and openness as was observable when it preceded the termination ity, I find it necessary to separate it from the consonant in bu-ty-ra'-ceous, which I have never heard pronounced, as well as in lu-cu-bra'tion, which I have, and this from no pretended agreement with the quantity of the Latin words these are derived from; for, in the former word, the u is doubtful: but, from the general system of quantity I see adopted in English pronunciation, this only will direct an English ear with certainty; for, though we may sometimes place the accent on words we borrow from the Greek or Latin on the same syllable as in those languages, as acumen, elegiac, &c.; nay, though we sometimes adopt the accent of the original with every word of the same termination we derive from it, as assidu'ity, vidu'ity, &c.; yet the quantity of the accented vowel is so often contrary to that of the Latin and Greek, that not a shadow of a rule can be drawn, in this point, from these languages to ours.† Thus, in the letter in question, in the Latin accumulo, dubius, tumor, &c., the first u is every where short; but in the English words accumulate, dubious, tumour, every where long. Nuptialis, murmur, turbulentus, &c., where the u in the first syllable in Latin is long, we as constantly pronounce it short in nuptial, murmur, turbulent, &c. Nor, indeed, can we wonder that a different economy of quantity is observable in the ancient and modern languages, as, in the former, two consonants almost always lengthen the preceding vowel, and in the latter as constantly shorten it. Thus, without arguing in a vicious circle, we find, that, as a division of the generality of words as they are actually pronounced, gives us the general laws of syllabication, so these laws, once understood, direct us in the division of such words as we have never heard actually pronounced, and consequently to the true pronunciation of them. For these operations, like cause and effect, reflect mutually a light on each other, and prove, that, by nicely observing the path which custom in language has once taken, we can more than guess at the line she must keep in a similar case, where her footsteps are not quite so discernible. So true is the observation of Scaliger: Ita omnibus in rebus certissima ratione sibi ipsa respondet natura. De causis Ling. Lat.

RULES

TO BE OBSERVED BY THE NATIVES OF IRELAND,

IN ORDER TO OBTAIN A JUST PRONUNCIATION OF ENGLISH.

AS Mr. Sheridan was a native of Ireland, and had the best opportunities of understanding those peculiarities of pronunciation which obtain there, I shall extract his observations on that subject as the best general direction, and add a few of my own, by way of supplement, which, I hope, will render this article of instruction still more complete.

The reader will be pleased to take notice, that, as I have made a different arrangement of the vowels, and I have adopted a notation different from Mr. Sheridan, I am obliged to make use of different figures to mark the vowels, but still such as perfectly correspond to his.

"The chief mistakes, made by the Irish in pronouncing English, lie, for the most part, in the sounds of the two first vowels, a and e; the former being generally sounded â by the Irish, as in the word bâr, in most words where it is pronounced â, as in day, by the English. Thus the Irish say, pâtron, mâtron, the vowel â having the same sound as in the word fâther; while the English pronounce them as if written paytron, maytron. The following rule, strictly attended to, will rectify this mistake through the whole language:—

"When the vowel a finishes a syllable, and has the accent on it, it is invariably pronounced â [day] by the English. To this rule there are but three exceptions in the whole language, to be found in the words fâther, papâ, mammâ. The Irish may think also the word rather an exception, as well as father; and so it would appear to be in their manner of pronouncing it rather, laying the accent on the vowel a; but, in the English pronunciation, the consonant th is taken into the first syllable, as, rath'-er, which makes the difference.

"Whenever a consonant follows the vowel a in the same syllable, and the accent is on the consonant, the vowel a has always its fourth sound, as hât, mân; as also the same sound lengthened when it precedes the letter r, as fâr, bâr, though the accent be on the vowel; as, likewise, when it precedes lm, as bâlm, psâlm. The Irish, ignorant of this latter exception, pronounce all words of that structure as if they were written hâwm, psâwm, quâwm, câwm, &c. In the third sound of a, marked by different combinations of vowels or consonants, such as au, in Paul; aw, in law; all, in call; ald, in bald; alk, in talk, &c., the Irish make no mistake, except in that of lm, as before mentioned.

"The second vowel, e, is, for the most part, sounded ee by the English, when the accent is upon it; whilst the Irish, in most words, give it the sound of slender â, as in hate. This sound of e [ee] is marked by different combinations of vowels, such as ea, ei, e final mute, ee, and ie. In the two last combinations of ee and ie, the Irish never mistake; such as in meet, seem, field, believe, &c.; but, in all the others, they almost universally change the sound of e into â. Thus, in the combination ea, they pronounce the words tea, sea, please, as if they were spelt tay, say, plays; instead of tee, see, please. The English constantly give this sound to ea whenever the accent is on the vowel e, except in the following words: great, pear, a bear, to bear, to forbear, to swear, to tear, to wear: in all which the e has the sound of â in hate. For want of knowing these exceptions, the gentlemen of Ireland, after some time of residence in London, are apt to fall into the general rule, and pronounce these words as if spelt greet, beer, sweat, &c.

"Ei is also sounded ee by the English, and as â by the Irish; thus the words decit, recit, recite, are pronounced by them as if written desate, resate. Ei is always sounded ee, except when a g follows it, as in the words reign, faign, deign, &c.; as also in the words rein (of a bridle), sein, drein, neil, heir, which are pronounced like rain, vain, drain, vail, air.

"The final mute e makes the preceding e in the same syllable, when accented, have the sound of ee, as in the words suprême, sincère, replète. This rule is almost universally broken through by the Irish, who pronounce all such words as if written suprême, sinsère, replète, &c. There are but two exceptions to this rule in the English pronunciation, which are the words there, where.

"In the way of marking this sound by a double e, (as thus, ee), as the Irish never make any mistakes, the best method for all who want to acquire the right pronunciation of these several combinations is, to suppose that ea, ei, and e, attended by a final mute e, are all spelt with a double e, or ee.

"Ey is always sounded like â by the English when the accent is upon it; as in the words prey, convey, pronounced pray, conway. To this there are but two exceptions, in the words key and ley, sounded kee, lee. The Irish, in attempting to pronounce like the English, often give the same sound to ey as usually belongs to ei; thus, for prey, convey, they say pree, convee.

"A strict observation of these few rules, with a due attention to the very few exceptions enumerated above, will enable the well-educated natives of Ireland to pronounce their words exactly in the same way as the more polished part of the inhabitants of England do, so far as the vowels are concerned. The diphthongs they commit no fault in, except in the sound of i, which has been already taken notice of in the Grammar;* where, likewise, the only difference in pronouncing any of the consonants has been pointed out; which is the thickening the sound of d and t, in certain situations; and an easy method proposed of correcting this habit.†

"In order to complete the whole, I shall now give a list of such detached words, that do not come under any of the above rules, as are pronounced differently in Ireland from what they are in England:—

* "Vide p. 11, where the true manner of pronouncing the diphthong i is pointed out; the Irish pronouncing it much in the same manner as the French."

† "The letter d has always the same sound by those who pronounce English well; but the provincials, particularly the Irish, Scotch, and Welsh, in many words thicken the sound by a mixture of breath. Thus, though they sound the d right in the positive loud and broad, in the comparative degree they thicken it by an aspiration, and sound it as if it were written loudher, broadher. This vicious pronunciation is produced by pushing the tongue forward so as to touch the teeth in forming that sound: and the way to cure it is easy; for, as they can pronounce the d properly in the word loud, let them rest a little upon that syllable, keeping the tongue in the position of forming l, and then let them separate it from the upper gum without pushing it forward, and the sound der will be produced of course; for the organ, being left in the position of sounding d at the end of the syllable loud, is necessarily in the position of forming the same d in uttering the last syllable, unless it makes a new movement, as in the case of protruding it so as to touch the teeth. This letter is sometimes, though not often, quiescent, as in the words handkerchief, handsome, handsel.

"In pronouncing the letter t, the Irish and other provincials thicken the sound, as was before mentioned with regard to the d; for better, they say beithet; for utter, utther; and so on in all words of that structure. This faulty manner arises from the same cause that was mentioned as affecting the sound of the d; I mean the protruding of the tongue so as to touch the teeth; and is curable only in the same way."

"These, after the closest attention, are all the words, not included in the rules before laid down, that I have been able to collect, in which the well-educated natives of Ireland differ from those of England."

I shall make no observations on the accuracy of this list, but desire my reader to observe, that the strongest characteristics of the pronunciation of Ireland are the rough, jarring pronunciation of the letter r, and the aspiration, or rough breathing, before all the accented vowels. (For the true sound of r, see that letter in the Principles, No. 419.) And for the rough breathing, or aspiration of the vowels, the pupil should be told not to bring the voice suddenly from the breast, but to speak, as it were, from the mouth only.

It may be observed, too, that the natives of Ireland pronounce rm at the end of a word so distinctly as to form two separate syllables. Thus storm and farm seem sounded by them as if written stau-rum, fa-rum; while the English sound the r so soft and so close to the m, that it seems pronounced nearly as if written stawn, faam.

Nearly the same observations are applicable to tm. When these letters end a word, they are, in Ireland, pronounced at such a distance, that helm and real'm sound as if written hel-um and real-um; but in England the l and m are pronounced as close as possible, and so as to form but one syllable. To remedy this, it will be necessary for the pupil to make a collection of words terminating with these consonants, and to practise them over till a true pronunciation is acquired.

RULES

TO BE OBSERVED BY THE NATIVES OF SCOTLAND,

FOR ATTAINING A JUST PRONUNCIATION OF ENGLISH.

THAT pronunciation which distinguishes the inhabitants of Scotland is of a very different kind from that of Ireland, and may be divided into the quantity, quality, and accentuation of the vowels. With respect to quantity, it may be observed, that the Scotch pronounce almost all their accented vowels long. Thus, if I am not mistaken, they would pronounce habit, hay-bit; tepid, tee-pid; sinner, see-ner; conscious, cone-shus; and subject, soob-ject.* it is not pretended, however, that every

* That this is the general mode of pronouncing these words in Scotland is indisputable; and it is highly probable that the Scotch have preserved the old English pronunciation, from which the English themselves have insensibly departed. Dr. Hicks observed long ago, that the Scotch Saxonised in their language much more than the English; and it is scarcely to be doubted that a situation nearer to the continent, and a greater commercial intercourse with other nations, made the English admit of numberless changes which never extended to Scotland. About the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when the Greek and Latin languages were cultivated, and the pedantry of showing an acquaintance with them became fashionable, it is not improbable that an alteration in the quantity of many words took place; for, as in Latin almost every accented vowel is so pronounced, but that such a pronunciation is very general, and particularly of the i. This vowel is short in English pronunciation, where the other vowels are long; thus, evasion, adhesion, emotion, confusion, have the a, e, o, and u, long; and in these instances the Scotch would pronounce them like the English; but in vision, decision, &c., where the English pronounce the i short, the Scotch lengthen this letter by pronouncing it like ee, as if the words were written vee-sion, de-see-sion, &c.; and this peculiarity is universal. The best way, therefore, to correct this, will be to make a collection of the most usual words which have the vowels short, and to pronounce them daily till a habit is formed. See Principles, No. 507.

vowel before a single consonant is short, so in English almost every vowel in the same situation was supposed to be long, or our ancestors would not have doubled the consonant in the participles of verbs, to prevent the preceding vowel from lengthening. But, when once this affectation of Latinity was adopted, it is no wonder it should extend beyond its principles, and shorten several vowels in English, because they were short in the original Latin; and in this manner, perhaps, might the diversity between the quantity of the English and the Scotch pronunciation arise. (542) (543) See Drama.

With respect to the quality of the vowels, it may be observed, that the inhabitants of Scotland are apt to pronounce the a like æ, where the English give it the slender sound: thus Satan is pronounced Sætan, and fatal, fætal. It may be remarked too, that the Scotch give this sound to the a preceded by w, according to the general rule, without attending to the exceptions, Principles, No. 88; and thus, instead of making wax, waft, and twang, rhyme with tax, shaft, and hang, they pronounce them so as to rhyme with box, soft, and song. The short e in bed, fed, red, &c., borders too much upon the English sound of a in bad, lad, mad, &c., and the short i in bid, lid, ria, too much on the English sound of e in bed, led, red. To correct this error, it would be useful to collect the long and short sounds of these vowels, and to pronounce the long ones first, and to shorten them by degrees till they are perfectly short; at the same time preserving the radical sound of the vowel in both. Thus the correspondent long sounds to the e in bed, fed, red, are bade, fade, rade; and that of the short i in bid, lid, rid, are bead, lead, read; and the former of these classes will naturally lead the ear to the true sound of the latter, the only difference lying in the quantity. The short o in not, lodge, got, &c., is apt to slide into the short u, as if the words were written nut, ludge, gut, &c. To rectify this, it should be remembered, that this o is the short sound of æ, and ought to have the radical sound of the deep a in ball. Thus the radical sound corresponding to the o in not, cot, so, is found in naught, caught, sought, &c.; and these long sounds, like the former, should be abbreviated into the short ones. But what will tend greatly to clear the difficulty will be, to remember that only those words which are collected in the Principles, No. 165, have the o sounded like short u when the accent is upon it: and with respect to the u in bull, full, pull, &c., it may be observed, that the pronunciation peculiar to the English is only found in the words enumerated, Principles, No. 174.

In addition to what has been said, it may be observed, that oo in food, mood, moon, soon, &c., which ought always to have a long sound, is generally shortened in Scotland to that middle sound of the u in bull: and it must be remembered, that wool, wood, good, hood, stood, foot, are the only words where this sound of oo ought to take place.

The accentuation, both in Scotland and Ireland, (if by accentuation we mean the stress, and not the kind of stress,) is so much the same as that of England, that I cannot recollect many words in which they differ. Indeed, if it were not so, the versification of each country would be different: for as English verse is formed by accent or stress, if this accent or stress were upon different syllables in different countries, what is verse in England would not be verse in Scotland or Ireland; and this sufficiently shows how very indefinitely the word accent is generally used.

Mr. Elphinston, who must be allowed to be a competent judge in this case, tells us, that in Scotland they pronounce silence, biàs, canvass, sentence, triumph, comfort, solace, construe, rescue, respite, govern, harass, ransack, cancel, with the accent on the last syllable, instead of the first. To this list may be added the word menace, which they pronounce as if written menass; and, though they place the accent on the last syllable of canal, like the English, they broaden the a in the last syllable, as if the word were spelt canawl. It may be farther observed, that they place an accent on the comparative adverb as, in the phrases as much, as little, as many, as great, &c., while the English, except in some very particular emphatical cases, lay no stress on this word, but pronounce these phrases like words of two or three syllables, without any accent on the first.

But, besides the mispronunciation of single words, there is a tone of voice with which these words are accompanied, that distinguishes a native of Ireland or Scotland, as much as an improper sound of the letters. This is vulgarly, and, if it does not mean stress only, but the kind of stress, I think, not improperly, called the accent.* For, though there is an asperity in the Irish dialect, and a drawl in the Scotch, independent of the slides or inflections they make use of, yet it may with confidence be affirmed, that much of the peculiarity which distinguishes these dialects may be reduced to a predominant use of one of these slides. Let any one, who has sufficiently studied the speaking voice to distinguish the slides, observe the pronunciation of an Irishman and a Scotchman, who have much of the dialect of their country, and he will find that the former abounds with the falling, and the latter with the rising inflection; and, if this is the case, a teacher, if he understands these slides, ought to direct his instruction so as to remedy the imperfection. But as avoiding the wrong, and seizing the right at the same instant, is, perhaps, too great a task for human powers, I would advise a native of Ireland, who has much of the accent, to pronounce almost all his words, and end all his sentences, with the rising slide; and a Scotchman, in the same manner, to use the falling inflection: this will, in some measure, counteract the natural propensity, and bids fairer for bringing the pupil to that nearly equal mixture of both slides, which distinguishes the English speaker, than endeavouring at first to catch the agreeable variety. For this purpose the teacher ought to pronounce all the single words in the lesson with the falling inflection to a Scotchman, and with the rising to an Irishman; and should frequently give the pauses in a sentence the same inflections to each of these pupils, where he would vary them to a native of England. But while the human voice remains unstudied, there is little expectation that this distinction of the slides should be applied to these useful purposes.

Besides a peculiarity of inflection, which I take to be a falling circumflex, directly opposite to that of the Scotch, the Welsh pronounce the sharp consonants and aspirations instead of the flat. (See Principles, No. 29, 11.) Thus for big they say pick; for blood, plood; and for good, coot. Instead of virtue and vice, they say virtue and fice; instead of zeal and praise, they say seal and prace; instead of these and those, they say these and thoce; and instead of azure and osier, they say aysher and osher; and for jail, chail. Thus there are nine distinct consonant sounds, which, to the Welsh, are entirely useless. To speak with propriety, therefore, the Welsh ought for some time to pronounce the flat consonants and aspirations only; that is, they ought not only to pronounce them where the letters require the flat sound, but even where they require the sharp sound: this will be the best way to acquire a habit; and, when this is once done, a distinction will be easily made, and a just pronunciation more readily acquired.

There is scarcely any part of England remote from the capital where a different system of pronunciation does not prevail. As in Wales they pronounce the sharp consonants for the flat, so in Somersetshire they pronounce many of the flat instead of the sharp: thus, for Somersetshire, they say Zomersetshire; for father, vather; for think, think, and for sure, shure.

There are dialects peculiar to Cornwall, Lancashire, Yorkshire, and every distant county in England; but, as a consideration of these would lead to a detail too minute for the present occasion, I shall conclude these remarks with a few observations on the peculiarities of my countrymen, the Cockneys; who, as they are the models of pronunciation to the distant provinces, ought to be the more scrupulously correct.

FIRST FAULT OF THE LONDONERS.

Pronouncing s indistinctly after st.

The letter s after st, from the very difficulty of its pronunciation, is often sounded inarticulately. The inhabitants of London, of the lower order, cut the knot, and pronounce it in a distinct syllable, as if e were before it; but this is to be avoided as the greatest blemish in speaking; the three last letters in posts, fists, mists, &c., must all be distinctly heard in one syllable, and without permitting the letters to coalesce. For the acquiring of this sound, it will be proper to select nouns that end in st or ste, to form them into plurals, and pronounce them forcibly and distinctly every day. The same may be observed of the third person of verbs ending in sts or stes; as persists, wastes, hastes, &c.

SECOND FAULT.

Pronouncing w for v, and inversely.

The pronunciation of v for w, and more frequently of w for v, among the inhabitants of London, and those not all ways of the lower order, is a blemish of the first magnitude. The difficulty of remedying this defect is the greater, as the cure of one of these mistakes has a tendency to promote the other.

Thus, if you are very careful to make a pupil pronounce veal and vinegar, not as if written veal and vinegar, you will find him very apt to pronounce wine and wind, as if written wine and wind. The only method of rectifying this habit seems to be this: Let the pupil select from a dictionary, not only all the words that begin with v, but as many as he can of those that have this letter in any other part. Let him be told to bite his under lip while he is sounding the v in those words, and to practise this every day, till he pronounces the v properly at first sight; then, and not till then, let him pursue the same method with the w; which he must be directed to pronounce by a pouting out of the lips, without suffering them to touch the teeth. Thus, by giving all the attention to only one of these letters at a time, and fixing by habit the true sound of that, we shall at last find both of them reduced to their proper pronunciation, in a shorter time than by endeavouring to rectify them both at once.

* See this more fully exemplified in Elements of Eloquence, vol. ii. page 13.

† Or rather the rising circumflex. For an explanation of this inflection, see Rhetorical Grammar, third edition, page 79.

‡ See the word Change.

THIRD FAULT

Not sounding h after w.

The aspirate h is often sunk, particularly in the capital, where we do not find the least distinction of sound between while and wile, whet and wet, where and were, &c. The best method to rectify this is, to collect all the words of this description from a dictionary, and write them down; and, instead of the wh, to begin them with hoo in a distinct syllable, and so to pronounce them. Thus, let while be written and sounded hoo-ile; whet, hoo-et; where, hoo-are; whip, hoo-ip, &c. This is no more, as Dr. Lowth observes, than placing the aspirate in its true position before the w, as it is in the Saxon, which the words come from; where we may observe, that, though we have altered the orthography of our ancestors, we have still preserved their pronunciation.

FOURTH FAULT.

Not sounding h where it ought to be sounded, and inversely.

A still worse habit than the last prevails, chiefly among the people of London, that of sinking the h at the beginning of words where it ought to be sounded, and of sounding it, either where it is not seen, or where it ought to be sunk. Thus we not unfrequently hear, especially among children, heart pronounced art, and arm, harm. This is a vice perfectly similar to that of pronouncing the v for the w, and the w for the v, and requires a similar method to correct it.

As there are so very few words in the language where the initial h is sunk, we may select these from the rest, and, without setting the pupil right when he mispronounces these, or when he prefixes h improperly to other words, we may make him pronounce all the words where h is sounded, till he has almost forgot there are any words pronounced otherwise. Then he may go over those words to which he improperly prefixes the h, and those where the h is seen, but not sounded, without any danger of an interchange. As these latter words are but few, I shall subjoin a catalogue of them for the use of the learner: heir, heires, herb, herbage, honest, honesty, honestly, honour, honourable, honourably, hospital, hostler, hour, hourly, humble, humbly, humbles, humour, humorist, humorous, humorously, humorsome: where we may observe, that humour and its compounds not only sink the h, but sound the u like the pronoun you, or the noun yew, as it written yewmour, yewmorous, &c.

Thus I have endeavoured to correct some of the more glaring errors of my countrymen, who, with all their faults, are still, upon the whole, the best pronouncers of the English language: for, though the pronunciation of London is certainly erroneous in many words, yet, upon being compared with that of any other place, it is undoubtedly the best; that is, not only the best by courtesy, and because it happens to be the pronunciation of the capital, but the best by a better title, that of being more generally received: or, in other words, though the people of London are erroneous in the pronunciation of many words, the inhabitants of every other place are erroneous in many more. Nay, harsh as the sentence may seem, those at a considerable distance from the capital do not only mispronounce many words taken separately, but they scarcely pronounce with purity a single word, syllable, or letter. Thus, if the short sound of the letter u in trunk, sunk, &c., differ from the sound of that letter in the northern parts of England, where they sound it like the u in bull, and nearly as if the words were written troonk, soonk, &c., it necessarily follows, that every word where the second sound of that letter occurs, must by those provincials be mispronounced.

But, though the inhabitants of London have this manifest advantage over all the other inhabitants of the island, and they have the disadvantage of being more disgraced by their peculiarities than any other people. The grand difference between the metropolis and the provinces is, that people of education in London are generally free from the vices of the vulgar; but the best educated people in the provinces, if constantly resident there, are sure to be strongly tainted with the dialect of the country in which they live. Hence it is, that the vulgar pronunciation of London, though not half so erroneous as that of Scotland, Ireland, or any of the provinces, is, to a person of correct taste, a thousand times more offensive and disgusting.

DIRECTIONS TO FOREIGNERS,

IN ORDER TO ATTAIN A KNOWLEDGE OF THE MARKS IN THIS DICTIONARY, AND TO ACQUIRE A RIGHT PRONUNCIATION OF EVERY WORD IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

AS the sounds of the vowels are different in different languages, it would be endless to bring parallel sounds from the various languages of Europe: but, as the French is so generally understood upon the Continent, if we can reduce the sounds of the English letters to those of the French, we shall render the pronunciation of our language very generally attainable; and this, it is presumed, will be pretty accurately accomplished by observing the following directions:

| A | B | C | D | E | F | G | H | I | J |
|-----|-----|----|---------|----|------|------|------|-----|-----|
| ei | bi | ci | di | i | ef | dgi | etch | ai | dje |
| K | L | M | N | O | P | Q | R | S | T |
| qué | ell | em | en | o | pi | kiou | arr | ess | ti |
| | U | V | W | X | Y | Z | | | |
| | iou | vi | dobliou | ex | ouai | zedd | | | |

The French have all our vowel sounds, and will therefore find the pronunciation of them very easy. The only difficulty they will meet with seems to be i, which, though demonstrably composed of two successive sounds, has passed for a simple vowel with a very competent judge of English pronunciation.* The reason is, these two sounds are pronounced so closely together as to require some attention to discover their component parts: this attention Mr. Sheridan† never gave, or he would not have told us that this diphthong is a compound of our fullest and slenderest sounds, â and é: the first made by the largest, and the last by the smallest aperture of the mouth. Now nothing is more certain than the inaccuracy of this definition. The third sound of a, which is perfectly equivalent to the third sound of o, when combined with the first sound of e, must inevitably form the diphthong in boy, joy, &c., and not the diphthongal sound of the vowel i in idle, or the personal pronoun i: this double sound will, upon a close examination, be found to be composed of the Italian a in the last syllable of papa, and the first sound of e, pronounced as closely together as possible;† and for the exactness of this definition, I appeal to every just English ear in the kingdom.

The other diphthongal vowel, u, is composed of the French i, pronounced as closely as possible to their diphthong ou, or the English ê and ô, perfectly equivalent.

† Holder, the most philosophical and accurate investigator of the formation and powers of the letters, says: "Our vulgar i, as in stille, seems to be such a diphthong, (or rather syllable, or part of a syllable,) composed of a, i, or e, i, and not a simple original vowel." Elements of Speech, page 95.

Dr. Wallis, speaking of the long English i, says it is sounded "eodem ferè modo quo Gallorum ai in vocibus main, manus; pain, panis &c. Nempe sonum habet compositum ex Gallorum e feminino et i vel y." Grammatica Linguae Anglicanae, page 48.

* Nares' Elements of Orthoëpy, page 2.

ent to the sound the French would give to the letters you, and which is exactly the sound the English give to the plural of the second personal pronoun.

The diphthong oi or oy is composed of the French ô and i; thus toy and boy would be exactly expressed to a Frenchman by writing them tâi, bâi.

The diphthongs ou and ov, when sounded like ou, are composed of the French ô and the diphthong ou; and the English sounds of thou and now may be expressed to a Frenchman by spelling them thôou and nôou.

W is no more than the French diphthong ou; thus West is equivalent to Ouest, and wall to ouâll.

Y is perfectly equivalent to the French letter of that name, and may be supplied by i; thus yoke, you, &c., are expressed by ioke, iou, &c.

J, or I consonant, must be pronounced by prefixing d to the French j; thus jay, joy, &c., sound to a Frenchman as if spelled djé, djâi, &c. If any difficulty be found in forming this combination of sounds, it will be removed by pronouncing the d, ed, and spelling these words edjé, edjâi, &c.

Ch, in English words not derived from the Greek, Latin, or French, is pronounced as if t were prefixed; thus the sound of chair, cheese, chain, &c., would be understood by a Frenchman as if the words were written tchére, tchéze, tchéne.

Sh in English is expressed by ch in French; thus shame, share, &c., would be spelled by a Frenchman chême, chère, &c.

The ringing sound ng in long, song, &c., may be perfectly conceived by a pupil who can pronounce the French word encore, as the first syllable of this word is exactly correspondent to the sound in those English words; and for the formation of it, see Principles, No. 57; also the word Encore.

But the greatest difficulty every foreigner finds in pronouncing English, is the hissing consonant th. This, it may be observed, has, like the other consonants, a sharp and a flat sound; sharp, as in thin, bath; flat, as in that, with. To acquire the true pronunciation of this difficult combination, it may be proper to begin with those words where it is initial: and, first, let the pupil protrude his tongue a little way beyond the teeth, and press it between them as if going to bite the tip of it; while this is doing, if he wishes to pronounce thin, let him hiss as if to sound the letter s; and, after the hiss, let him draw back his tongue within his teeth, and pronounce the preposition in, and thus will the word thin be perfectly pronounced. If he would pronounce that, let him place the tongue between the teeth as before; and, while he is hissing as if to sound the letter z, let him withdraw his tongue into his mouth, and immediately pronounce the preposition at. To pronounce this combination when final in bath, let him pronounce ba, and protrude the tongue beyond the teeth, pressing the tongue with them, and hissing as if to sound s; if he would pronounce with, let him first form wi, put the tongue in the same position as before, and hiss as if to sound z. It will be proper to make the pupil dwell some time with the tongue beyond the teeth, in order to form a habit, and to pronounce daily some words out of a dictionary beginning and ending with these letters.

These directions, it is presumed, if properly attended to, will be sufficient to give such foreigners as understand French, and have not access to a master, a competent knowledge of English pronunciation; but, to render the sounds of the vowels marked by figures in this Dictionary still more easily to be comprehended, with those English words which exemplify the sounds of the vowels, I have associated such French words as have vowels exactly corresponding to them, and which immediately convey the true English pronunciation. These should be committed to memory, or written down and held in his hand while the pupil is inspecting the Dictionary.

Perhaps the greatest advantage to foreigners and provincials will be derived from the classification of words of a similar sound, and drawing the line between the general rule and the exception. This has been an arduous task; but it is hoped the benefit arising from it will amply repay it. When the numerous varieties of sounds annexed to vowels, diphthongs, and consonants, lie scattered without bounds, a learner is bewildered, and discouraged from attempting to distinguish them; but when they are all classed, arranged, and enumerated, the variety seems less, the number smaller, and the distinction easier. What an inextricable labyrinth do the diphthongs ea and ou form as they lie loose in the language! but, classed and arranged as we find them, No. 226, &c., and 313, &c., the confusion vanishes, they become much less formidable, and a learner has it in his power, by repeating them daily, to become master of them all in a very little time.

The English accent is often an insurmountable obstacle to foreigners, as the rules for it are so various, and the exceptions so numerous; but let the inspector consult the article Accent in the Principles, particularly No. 492, 505, 506, &c., and he will soon perceive how much of our language is regularly accented, and how much that which is irregular is facilitated by an enumeration of the greater number of exceptions.

But scarcely any method will be so useful for gaining the English accent as the reading of verse. This will naturally lead the ear to the right accentuation; and, though a different position of the accent is frequently to be met with in the beginning of a verse, there is a sufficient regularity to render the pronouncing of verse a powerful means of obtaining such a distinction of force and feebleness as is commonly called the accent: for it may be observed, that a foreigner is no less distinguishable by placing an accent upon certain words, to which the English give no stress, than by placing the stress upon a wrong syllable. Thus if a foreigner, when he calls for bread at table, by saying, give me some bread, lays an equal stress upon every word, though every word should be pronounced with its exact sound, we immediately perceive he is not a native. An Englishman would pronounce these four words like two, with the accent on the first syllable of the first, and on the last syllable of the last, as if written giveme somebréd; or, rather, giveme sunbréd; or, more commonly, though vulgarly, givems somebréd. Verse may sometimes induce a foreigner, as it does sometimes injudicious natives, to lay the accent on a syllable, in long words, which ought to have none, as in a couplet of Pope's Essay on Criticism:

"False eloquence, like the prismatic glass,
Its gaudy colours spreads on every place."

Here a foreigner would be apt to place an accent on the last syllable of eloquence as well as the first, which would be certainly wrong; but this fault is so trifling, when compared with that of laying the accent on the second syllable, that it almost vanishes from observation; and this misaccentuation, verse will generally guard him from. The reading of verse, therefore, will, if I am not mistaken, be found a powerful regulator both of accent and emphasis.

WALKER'S PRINCIPLES OF ENGLISH PRONUNCIATION.

1. THE First Principles or Elements of Pronunciation are Letters.

The Letters of the English Language are :

| Roman. | Italick. | Name. |
|--------|----------|-----------------------|
| A a | A a | a |
| B b | B b | bee |
| C c | C c | see |
| D d | D d | dee |
| E e | E e | e |
| F f | F f | eff |
| G g | G g | jee |
| H h | H h | aitch |
| I i | I i | i or eye |
| J j | J j | j consonant, or jay |
| K k | K k | kay |
| L l | L l | el |
| M m | M m | em |
| N n | N n | en |
| O o | O o | o |
| P p | P p | pee |
| Q q | Q q | cue |
| R r | R r | ar |
| S s | S s | ess |
| T t | T t | tee |
| U u | U u | u or you |
| V v | V v | v consonant or vee |
| W w | W w | double u |
| X x | X x | eks |
| Y y | Y y | wy |
| Z z | Z z | zed, or izzard. (483) |

2. To these may be added certain combinations of letters sometimes used in printing; as fl, ff, fi, ffi, fil, and &, or and per se and, or rather et per se and; ff, ff, fi, ffi, fil, &c.

3. Our letters, says Dr. Johnson, are commonly reckoned twenty-four, because anciently i and j, as well as u and v, were expressed by the same character; but as these letters, which had always different powers, have now different forms, our alphabet may be properly said to consist of twenty-six letters.

4. In considering the sounds of these first principles of language, we find that some are so simple and unmixed, that there is nothing required but the opening of the mouth to make them understood, and to form different sounds. Whence they have the names of vowels, or voices, or vocal sounds. On the contrary, we find that there are others, whose pronunciation depends on the particular application and use of every part of the mouth, as the teeth, the lips, the tongue, the palate, &c, which yet cannot make any one perfect sound but by their union with those vocal sounds; and these are called consonants, or letters sounding with other letters.

Definition of Vowels and Consonants.

5. Vowels are generally reckoned to be five in number; namely, a, e, i, o, u; y and v are called vowels when they end a syllable or word, and consonants when they begin one.

6. The definition of a vowel, as little liable to exception as any, seems to be the following: A vowel is a simple sound formed by a continued effusion of the breath, and a certain conformation of the mouth, without any alteration in the position, or any motion of the organs of speech, from the moment the vocal sound commences till it ends.

7. A consonant may be defined to be an interruption of the effusion of vocal sound, arising from the application of the organs of speech to each other.

8. Agreeably to this definition, vowels may be divided into two kinds, the simple and compound. The simple, a, e, o, are those which are formed by one conformation of the organs only; that is, the organs remain exactly in the same position at the end as at the beginning of the letter; whereas in the compound vowels i and u, the organs alter their position before the letter is completely sounded; nay, these letters, when commencing a syllable, do not only require a different position of the organs in order to form them perfectly, but demand such an application of the tongue to the roof of the mouth, as is inconsistent with the nature of a pure vowel; for the first of these letters, i, when sounded alone, or ending a syllable with the accent upon it, is a real diphthong, composed of the sounds of a in father, and of e in the, exactly correspondent to the sound of the noun eye; and when this letter commences a syllable, as in min-ion, pin-ion, &c. the sound of e, with which it terminates, is squeezed into a consonant sound, like the double e heard in queen, different from the simple sound of that letter in queen, and this squeezed sound in the commencing i makes it exactly similar to y in the same situation; which, by all grammarians, is acknowledged to be a consonant.* The latter of these compound vowels, u, when initial, and not shortened by a consonant, commences with this squeezed sound of e, equivalent to the y, and ends with a sound given to oo in woo and coo, which makes its name in the alphabet exactly similar to the pronoun you.† If, therefore, the common definition of a vowel be just, these two letters are so far from being simple vowels, that they may more properly be called semi-consonant diphthongs.

9. That y and v are consonants when they begin a word, and vowels when they end one, is generally acknowledged by the best grammarians; and yet Dr. Lowth

* How so accurate a grammarian as Dr. Lowth could pronounce so definitely on the nature of y, and insist on its being always a vowel, can only be accounted for by considering the small attention which is generally paid to this part of grammar. His words are these:

"The same sound which we express by the initial y, our Saxon ancestors in many instances expressed by the vowel e; as cover, your; and by the vowel i; as in, yeo; long, young. In the word yeo the initial y has precisely the same sound with i in the words vieu, lieu, adieu: the i is acknowledged to be a vowel in these latter; how then can the y, which has the very same sound, possibly be a consonant in the former? Its initial sound is generally like that of i in shire, or ee nearly; it is formed by the opening of the mouth without any motion or contact of the parts: in a word, it has every property of a vowel, and not one of a consonant." Introd. to Eng. Gram. page 3.

Thus far the learned bishop, who has too fixed a fame to suffer any diminution by a mistake in so trifling a part of literature as this: but it may be asked, if y has every property of a vowel and not one of a consonant, why, when it begins a word, does it not admit of the euphonical article an before it?

† An ignorance of the real composition of u, and a want of knowing that it partook of the nature of a consonant, has occasioned a great diversity and uncertainty in prefixing the indefinite article an before it. Our ancestors, judging of its nature from its name, never suspected that it was not a pure vowel, and constantly prefixed the article an before nouns beginning with this letter: as an union, an useful book. They were confirmed in this opinion by finding the an always adapted to the short u, as an empire, an umbrella, without ever dreaming that the short u is a pure vowel, and essentially different from the long one. But the moderns, not resting in the name of a letter, and consulting their ears rather than their eyes, have frequently placed the a instead of an before the long u, and we have seen a union, a university, a useful book, from some of the most respectable pens of the present age. Nor can we doubt a moment of the propriety of this orthography, when we reflect that these words actually begin to the ear with y, and might be spelled yunion, yuniversity, youseful, and can therefore no more admit of an before them than year and youth. See Remarks on the word An in this Dictionary.

has told us, that w is equivalent to oo; but if this were the case, it would always admit of the particle an before it: for though we have no word in the language which commences with these letters, we plainly perceive, that if we had such a word, it would readily admit of an before it, and consequently that these letters are not equivalent to w. Thus we find, that the common opinion, with respect to the double capacity of these letters, is perfectly just.

10. B. sides the vowels already mentioned, there is another simple vowel sound found under the oo in the words wood and too; these letters have, in these two words, every property of a pure vowel, but when found in food, mood, &c. and in the word too, pronounced like the adjective two: here the oo has a squeezed sound, occasioned by contracting the mouth, so as to make the lips nearly touch each other; and this makes it, like the i and u, not so much a double vowel, as a sound between a vowel and a consonant.

Classification of Vowels and Consonants.

11. Vowels and consonants being thus defined, it will be necessary, in the next place, to arrange them into such classes as their similitudes and specifick differences seem to require.

12. Letters, therefore, are naturally divisible into vowels and consonants.

13 The vowels are, a, e, i, o, u, and y and w when ending a syllable.

14 The consonants are, b, c, d, f, g, h, j, k, l, m, n, p, q, r, s, t, v, x, z, and y and w when beginning a syllable.

15. The vowels may be subdivided into such as are simple and pure, and into such as are compound and impure. The simple or pure vowels are such as require only one conformation of the organs to form them, and no motion in the organs while forming.

16. The compound or impure vowels are such as require more than one conformation of the organs to form them, and a motion in the organs while forming. These observations premised, we may call the following scheme

An Analogical Table of the Vowels.

|----|----------|--------------------------------|---|---------|---------------------------------|
| a | pa-per, | } simple or pure vowels. | i | ti-tle, | } compound or impure vowels. |

| e | me-tre, | | w | pow-er, | |
| o | no-ble, | | | | |
| oo | coo, | | | | |

29. These several properties of the consonants may be exhibited at one view in the following table, which may be called

An Analogical Table of the Consonants.

30. Vowels and consonants being thus defined and arranged, we are the better enabled to enter upon an inquiry into their different powers, as they are differently combined with each other. But previous to this, that nothing may be wanting to form a just idea of the first principles of pronunciation, it may not be improper to show the organic formation of each letter.

Organick Formation of the Letters.

31. Though I think every mechanical account of the organic formation of the letters rather curious than useful, yet, that nothing which can be presented to the eye may be wanting to inform the ear, I shall in this follow those who have been at the pains to trace every letter to its seat, and make us, as it were, touch the sounds we articulate.

Organick Formation of the Vowels.

32. It will be necessary to observe, that there are three long sounds of the letter a, which are formed by a greater or less expansion of the internal parts of the mouth.

33. The German a heard in ball, wall, &c. is formed by Diphthongs and Triphthongs enumerated.

17. Two vowels forming but one syllable are generally called a diphthong, and three a triphthong: these are the following.

18. The consonants are divisible into mutes, semi-vowels, and liquids.

19. The mutes are such as emit no sound without a vowel, as b, p, t, d, k, and c and g hard.

20. The semi-vowels are such as emit a sound without the concurrence of a vowel, as, f, v, s, z, x, g soft, or j.

21. The liquids are such as flow into, or unite easily with the mutes, as l, m, n, r.

22. But, besides these, there is another classification of the consonants, of great importance to a just idea of the nature of the letters, and that is, into such as are sharp or flat, and simple or aspirated.

23. The sharp consonants are, p, f, t, s, k, c hard.

24. The flat consonants are, b, v, d, z, g hard.

25. The simple consonants are those which have always the sound of one letter unmixed with others, as, b, p, f, v, k, g hard, and g soft, or j.

26. The mixed or aspirated consonants are those which have sometimes a hiss or aspiration joined with them, which mingles with the letter, and alters its sound, as t in motion, d in soldier, s in mission, and z in azure.

27. There is another distinction of consonants arising either from the seat of their formation, or from those organs which are chiefly employed in forming them. The best distinction of this kind seems to be that which divides them into labials, dentals, gutturals, and nasals.

28. The labials are b, p, f, v. The dentals are t, d, s, z, and soft g or j. The gutturals are k, q, c hard, and g hard. The nasals are m, n, and ng.

a strong and grave expression of the breath through the mouth, which is open nearly in a circular form, while the tongue, contracting itself to the root, as if to make way for the sound, almost rests upon the under jaw.

34. The Italian a, heard in father, closes the mouth a little more than the German a; and by raising the lower jaw, widening the tongue, and advancing it a little nearer to the lips, renders its sound less hollow and deep.

35. The slesier a, or that heard in lane, is formed in the mouth still higher than the last; and in pronouncing it, the lips, as if to give it a slender sound, dilate their aperture horizontally; while the tongue, to assist this narrow emission of breath, widens itself to the cheeks, raises itself nearer the palate, and by these means a less hollow sound than either of the former is produced.

36. The e in e-qual is formed by dilating the tongue a little more, and advancing it nearer to the palate and the lips, which produces the slenderest vowel in the language; for the tongue is, in the formation of this letter, as close to the palate as possible, without touching it; as the moment the tongue touches the palate, the squeezed sound o ee in thee and meet is formed, which, by its description, must partake of the sound of the consonant y.

37. The i in i-dol is formed by uniting the sound of the Italian a in father and the e in e-equal and pronouncing them as closely together as possible. See Directions to Foreigners, at the beginning of this book.

38. The o in o-pen is formed by nearly the same position of the organs as the a in wa-ter; but the tongue is advanced a little more into the middle of the mouth, the lips are protruded, and form a round aperture like the form of the letter, and the voice is not so deep in the mouth as when a is formed, but advances to the middle or hollow of the mouth.

39. The u in u-nit is formed by uniting the squeezed sound ee to a simple vowel sound, heard in woo and coo; the oo in these words is formed by protruding the lips a little more than in o, forming a smaller aperture with them, and, instead of swelling the voice in the middle of the mouth, bringing it as forward as possible to the lips.

40. Y final in try is formed like i: and w final in now, like the oo, which has just been described.

In this view of the organick formation of the vowels we find that a, e, and o, are the only simple or pure vowels: that i is a diphthong, and that u is a semi-consonant. If we were inclined to contrive a scale for measuring the breadth or narrowness, or, as others term it, the openness or closeness of the vowels, we might begin with e open, as Mr. Elphinston calls it, and which he announces to be the closest of all the vocal powers. In the pronunciation of this letter we find the aperture of the mouth extended on each side; the lips almost closed, and the sound issuing horizontally. The slender a in waste opens the mouth a little wider. The a in father opens the mouth still more without contracting the corners. The German a heard in wall, not only opens the mouth wider than the former a, but contracts the corners of the mouth so as to make the aperture approach nearer to a circle, while the o opens the mouth still more, and contracts the corners so as to make it the os rotundum, a picture of the letter it sounds. If, therefore, the other vowels were, like o, to take their forms from the aperture of the mouth in pronouncing them, the German a ought necessarily to have a figure as nearly approaching the o in form as it does in sound; that is, it ought to have that elliptical form which approaches nearest to the circle; as the a of the Italians, and that of the English in father, ought to form ovals, in exact proportion to the breadth of their sounds; the English a in waste ought to have a narrower oval; the e in the ought to have the curve of a parabola, and the squeezed sound of ee in seen a right line; or to reduce these lines to solids, the o would be a perfect globe, the German a an oblate spheroid like the figure of the earth, the Italian a an egg, the English slender a a Dutch skittle, the e a rolling-pin, and the double e a cylinder.

Organick Formation of the Consonants.

41. The best method of showing the organick formation of the consonants will be, to class them into such pairs as they naturally fall into, and then, by describing one, we shall nearly describe its fellow; by which means the labour will be lessened, and the nature of the consonants better perceived. The consonants that fall into pairs are the following:

| p | f | t | s | sh | th | k | ch | chair , |
| b | v | d | z | zh | dh | g | j | jail . |

42. Holder, who wrote the most elaborately and philosophically upon this subject, tells us, in his Elements of Speech, that when we only whisper we cannot distinguish the first rank of these letters from the second. It is certain the difference between them is very nice; the upper letters seeming to have only a smarter, brisker appulse of the organs than the lower; which may not improperly be distinguished by sharp and flat. The most marking distinction between them will be found to be a sort of guttural murmur, which precedes the latter letters when we wish to pronounce them forcibly, but not the former. Thus if we close the lips, and put the fingers on them to keep them shut, and strive to pronounce the p, no sound at all will be heard: but in striving to pronounce the b we shall find a murmuring sound from the throat, which seems the commencement of the letter; and if we do but stop the breath by the appulse of the organs, in order to pronounce with greater force, the same may be observed of the rest of the letters.

43. This difference in the formation of these consonants may be more distinctly perceived in the s and t than in any other of the letters; the former is sounded by the simple issue of the breath between the teeth, without any vibration of it in the throat, and may be called a hissing sound; while the latter cannot be formed without generating a sound in the throat, which may be called a vocal sound. The upper rank of letters, therefore, may be called breathing consonants; and the lower, vocal ones.

44. These observations premised, we may proceed to describe the organick formation of each letter.

45. P and B are formed by closing the lips till the breath is collected, and then letting it issue by forming the vowel e.

46. F and V are formed by pressing the upper teeth upon the under lip, and sounding the vowel e before the former and after the latter of these letters.

47. T and D are formed by pressing the tip of the tongue to the gums of the upper teeth, and then separating them, by pronouncing the vowel e.

48. S and Z are formed by placing the tongue in the same position as in T and D, but not so close to the gums, as to stop the breath: a space is left between the tongue and the palate for the breath to issue, which forms the hissing and buzzing sound of these letters.

49. SH heard in mission, and zh in evasion, are formed in the same seat of sound as s and z; but in the former the tongue is drawn a little inwards, and at a somewhat greater distance from the palate, which occasions a fuller effusion of breath from the hollow of the mouth, than in the latter, which are formed nearer to the teeth.

50. TH in think, and the same letters in that, are formed by protruding the tongue between the fore teeth, pressing it against the upper teeth, and at the same time endeavouring to sound the s or z; the former letter to sound th in think, and the latter to sound th in that.

51. K and G hard are formed by pressing the middle of the tongue to the roof of the mouth near the throat, and separating them a little smartly to form the first, and more gently to form the last of these letters.

52. CH in chair, and J in jail, are formed by pressing t to sh, and d to zh.

53. M is formed by closing the lips, as in P and B, and letting the voice issue by the nose.

54. N is formed by resting the tongue in the same position as in T or D, and breathing through the nose, with the mouth open.

55. L is formed by nearly the same position of the organs as t and d, but more with the tip of the tongue, which is brought a little forwarder to the teeth, while the breath issues from the mouth.

56. R is formed by placing the tongue nearly in the position of t, but at such a distance from the palate as suffices it to jar against it, when the breath is propelled from the throat to the mouth.

57. NG in ring, sing, &c. is formed in the same seat of sound as hard g; but while the middle of the tongue presses the roof of the mouth, as in G, the voice passes principally through the nose, as in N.

58. Y consonant is formed by placing the organs in the position of e, and squeezing the tongue against the roof of the mouth, which produces ee, which is equivalent to initial y. (36.)

59. W consonant is formed by placing the organs in the position of oo, described under u, and closing the lips a little more, in order to propel the breath upon the succeeding vowel which it articulates.

60. In this sketch of the formation and distribution of the consonants, it is curious to observe on how few radical principles the almost infinite variety of combination in language depends. It is with some degree of wonder we perceive that the slightest aspiration, the almost insensible inflection of nearly similar sounds, often generate the most different and opposite meanings. In this view of nature, as in every other, we find uniformity and variety very conspicuous. The single flat, at first impressed on the chaos, seems to operate on languages; which, from the simplicity and paucity of their principles, and the extent and power of their combinations, prove the goodness, wisdom, and omnipotence of their origin.

61. This analogical association of sounds is not only curious, but useful: it gives us a comprehensive view of the powers of the letters; and, from the small number that are radically different, enables us to see the rules on which their varieties depend: it discovers to us the genius and propensities of several languages and dialects, and, when authority is silent, enables us to decide agreeably to analogy.

62. The vowels, diphthongs, and consonants, thus enumerated and defined, before we proceed to ascertain their different powers, as they are differently associated with each other, it may be necessary to give some account of those distinctions of sound in the same vowels which express their quantity as long or short, or their quality as open or close, or slender and broad. This will appear the more necessary, as these distinctions so frequently occur in describing the sounds of the vowels, and as they are not unfrequently used with too little precision by most writers on the subject.

Of the Quantity and Quality of the Vowels.

63. The first distinction of sound that seems to obtrude itself upon us when we utter the vowels, is a long and a short sound according to the greater or less duration of time taken up in pronouncing them. This distinction is so obvious as to have been adopted in all languages, and is that to which we annex clearer ideas than to any other.

and though the short sounds of some vowels have not in our language been classed with sufficient accuracy with their parent long ones, yet this has bred but little confusion, as vowels long and short are always sufficiently distinguishable; and the nice appropriation of short sounds to their specific long ones is not necessary to our conveying what sound we mean, when the letter to which we apply these sounds is known, and its power agreed upon.

64. The next distinction of vowels into their specific sounds, which seems to be the most generally adopted, is that which arises from the different apertures of the mouth in forming them. It is certainly very natural, when we have so many more simple sounds than we have characters by which to express them, to distinguish them by that which seems their organic definition; and we accordingly find vowels denominated by the French, ouvert and fermé; by the Italians, aperto and chiuso; and by the English open and shut.

65. But whatever propriety there may be in the use of these terms in other languages, it is certain they must be used with caution in English, for fear of confounding them with long and short. Dr. Johnson and other grammarians call the a in father the open a: which may, indeed, distinguish it from the slender a in paper; but not from the broad a in water, which is still more open. Each of these letters has a short sound, which may be called a shut sound; but the long sound cannot be so properly denominated open as more or less broad; that is, the a in paper, the slender sound; the a in father, the broadish or middle sound; and the a in water, the broad sound. The same may be observed of the o. This letter has three long sounds, heard in more, note, nor; which graduate from slender to broadish, and broad, like the a. The i also in mine may be called the broad i; and that in machine the slender i; though each of them is equally long; and though these vowels that are long may be said to be more or less open according to the different apertures of the mouth in forming them, yet the short vowels cannot be said to be more or less shut; for as short always implies shut (except in verse), though long does not always imply open, we must be careful not to confound long and open, and close and shut, when we speak of the quantity and quality of the vowels. The truth of it is, all vowels either terminate a syllable, or are united with a consonant. In the first case, if the accent be on the syllable, the vowel is long, though it may not be open: in the second case, where a syllable is terminated by a consonant, except that consonant be r, whether the accent be on the syllable or not, the vowel has its short sound, which, compared with its long one, may be called shut; but as no vowel can be said to be shut that is not joined to a consonant, all vowels that end syllables may be said to be open, whether the accent be on them or not. (550) (551.)

66. But though the terms long and short, as applied to vowels, are pretty generally understood, an accurate ear will easily perceive that these terms do not always mean the long and short sounds of the respective vowels to which they are applied; for if we choose to be directed by the ear in denominating vowels long or short, we must certainly give these appellations to those sounds only which have exactly the same radical tone, and differ only in the long or short emission of that tone. Thus measuring the sounds of the vowels by this scale, we shall find that the long i and y have properly no short sounds but such as seem essentially distinct from their long ones; and that the short sound of these vowels is no other than the short sound of e, which is the latter letter in the composition of these diphthongs. (37.)

67. The same want of correspondence in classing the long and short vowels we find in a, e, o, and u; for as the e in theme does not find its short sound in the same letter in them, but in the i in him; so the e in them must descend a step lower into the province of a for its long sound in tame. The a in carry is not the short sound of the a in care, but of that in car, father, &c. as the short broad sound of the a in want is the true abbreviation of that in wall. The sound of o in don, gone, &c. is exactly correspondent to the a in swan, and finds its long sound in the a in wall, or the diphthong aw in dawn, lawn, &c.; while the short sound of the o in tone is nearly that of the same letter in ton, (a weight), and corresponding with what is generally called the short sound of u in tun, gun, &c. as the long sound of u in pule must find its short sound in the u in pull, bull, &c.; for this vowel, like the i and y, being a diphthong, its short sound is formed from the latter part of the letter equivalent to double o, as the word pule, if spelled according to the sound, might be written peoole.

68. Another observation preparatory to a consideration of the various sounds of the vowels and consonants seems to be the influence of the accent; as the accent or stress which is laid upon certain syllables has so obvious an effect upon the sounds of the letters, that unless we take accent into the account, it will be impossible to reason rightly upon the proper pronunciation of the Elements of Speech.

69. It may be first observed, that the exertion of the organs of speech necessary to produce the accent or stress, has an obvious tendency to preserve the letters in their pure and uniform sound, while the relaxation or feebleness which succeeds the accent as naturally suffers the letters to slide into a somewhat different sound a little easier to the organs of pronunciation. Thus the first a in cabbage is pronounced distinctly with the true sound of that letter, while the second a goes into an obscure sound bordering on the i short, the slenderest of all sounds; so that cabbage and village have the a in the last syllable scarcely distinguishable from the e and i in the last syllables of college and vestige.

70. In the same manner the a, e, i, o, and y, coming before r in a final unaccented syllable, go into an obscure sound so nearly approaching to the short u, that if the accent were carefully kept upon the first syllables of liar, liez, elizer, mayor, martyr, &c. these words, without any perceptible change in the sound of their last syllables, might all be written and pronounced, liur, liur, elizur, mayur, martur, &c.

71. The consonants also are no less altered in their sound by the position of the accent than the vowels. The k and s in the composition of x, when the accent is on them, in exercise, execute, &c. preserve their strong pure sound; but when the accent is on the second syllable, in exact, exonerate, &c. these letters slide into the duller and weaker sounds of g and z, which are easier to the organs of pronunciation. Hence not only the soft c and s go into sh, but even the t before a diphthong slides into the same letters when the stress is on the preceding syllable. Thus in society and satiety the c and t preserve their pure sound, because the syllables ci and ti have the accent on them; but in social and satiolate, these syllables come after the stress, and, from the feebleness of their situation, naturally fall into the shorter and easier sound, as if written soshial and sashiate. See the word Satiety.

72. A has three long sounds and two short ones.

73. The first sound of the first letter in our alphabet is that which among the English is its name. (See the letter A at the beginning of the Dictionary.) This is what is called by most grammarians its slender sound (35) (65); we find it in the words lade, spade, trade, &c. In the diphthong ai we have exactly the same sound of this letter, as in pain, gain, stain, &c. and sometimes in the diphthong ea, as bear, snear, pear, &c.; nay, twice we find it, contrary to every rule of pronunciation, in the words where and there, and once in the anomalous diphthong ao in gaol. It exactly corresponds to the sound of the French e in the beginning of the words être and tête.

74. The long slender a is generally produced by a silent e at the end of the syllable, which e not only keeps one single intervening consonant from shortening the preceding vowel, but sometimes two; thus we find the mute e makes of rag, rage, and very improperly keeps the a open even in range, change, &c. (See Change;) hat, with the mute e becomes hate, and the a continues open, and, perhaps, somewhat longer in haste, waste, paste, &c. though it must be confessed this seems the privilege only of a; for the other vowels contract before the consonants ng in revenge, cringe, plunge; and the ste in our language is preceded by no other vowel but this. Every consonant but n shortens every vowel but a, when soft g and e silent succeed; as bilge, badge, hinge, sponge, &c.

75. Hence we may establish this general rule: A has the long, open, slender sound, when followed by a single consonant, and e mute, as lade, made, fade, &c. The only exceptions seem to be, have, are, gape, and bade, the past time of to bid.

76. A has the same sound, when ending an accented syllable, as pa-per, ta-per, spec-ta-tor. The only exceptions are fa-ther, ma-ster, wa-ter.

77. As the short sound of the long slender a is not found under the same character, but in the short e (as may be perceived by comparing mate and met) (67.) we proceed to delineate the second sound of this vowel, which is that heard in father, and is called by some the open sound (34); but this can never distinguish it from the deeper sound of the a in all, ball, &c. which is still more open: by some it is styled the middle sound of a, as between the a in pale, and that in wall: it answers nearly to the Italian a in Toscano, Romano, &c. or to the final a in the naturalized Greek words, papa and mamma; and in baa; the word adopted in almost all languages to express the cry of sheep. We seldom find the long sound of this letter in our language, except in monosyllables ending with r, as far, tar, mar, &c. and in the word father. There are certain words from the Latin, Italian, and Spanish languages, such as tumbago, bravado, torna- do, camisado, furrage, &c which are sometimes heard with this sound of a; but except in bravo, heard chiefly at the Theatres, the English sound of a is preferable in all these words.

73. The long sound of the middle or Italian a is always found before r in monosyllables, as car, far, mar, &c. before the liquids lm; whether the latter only be pronounced, as in psalm, or both, as in psalmist; sometimes before lf, and lee, as calf, half, calve, halve, salve, &c.; and, lastly, before the sharp aspirated dental th in bath, path, lath, &c. and in the word father, this sound of the a was formerly more than at present found before the nasal liquid n, especially when succeeded by c, t, or d, as dance, glance, lance, France, chance, prance, grant, plant, slant, slander, &c.

79. The hissing consonant s was likewise a sign of this sound of the a, whether doubled, as in glass, grass, lass, &c. or accompanied by t, as in last, vast, fast, &c.; but this pronunciation of a seems to have been for some years advancing to the short sound of this letter, as heard in hand, land, grand, &c. and pronouncing the a in after, answer, basket, plant, mast, &c. as long as in half, calf, &c. borders very closely on vulgarity. It must be observed, however, that the a before n in monosyllables, and at the end of words, was anciently written with u after it, and so probably pronounced as broad as the German a; for Dr. Johnson observes, "many words pronounced with a broad were anciently written with au, as sault, mault; and we still write fault, vault. This was probably the Saxon sound, for it is yet retained in the northern dialects, and in the rustick pronunciation, as maun for man, haund for hand." But since the u has vanished, the a has been gradually pronounced slenderer and sharter, till now almost every vestige of the ancient orthography seems lost; though the termination mand in command, demand, &c. formerly written commāund, demāund, &c. still retains the long sound invariably.*

80. As the mute l in calm, psalm, calf, half, &c. seems to lengthen the sound of this letter, so the abbreviation of some words by apostrophe seems to have the same effect. Thus when, by impatience, that grand corrupter of manners, as well as language, the no is cut out of the word cannot, and the two syllables reduced to one, we find the a lengthened to the Italian or middle a, as can-not, can't; have not, han't; shall not, sha'n't; &c. This is no more than what the Latin language is subject to; it being a known rule in that tongue, that when, by composition or otherwise, two short syllables become one, that syllable is almost always long, as alius has the penultimate long because it comes from alius, and the two short vowels in cogo become one long vowel in cogo, &c.

81. The short sound of the middle or Italian a, which is generally confounded with the short sound of the slender a, is the sound of this vowel in man, pan, tan, mat, hat, &c.; we generally find this sound before any two successive consonants, (those excepted in the foregoing remarks), and even when it comes before an r, if a vowel follow, or the r be doubled; for if this consonant be doubled, in order to produce another syllable, the long sound becomes short, as mar, marry, car, carry, &c. where we find the monosyllable has the long, and the dissyllable the short sound; but if a c come before r, followed by another consonant, it has its long sound, as in part, partial, &c.

82. The only exception to this rule is in adjectives derived from substantives ending in r; for in this case the a continues long, as in the primitive. Thus the a in starry, or full of stars, is as long as in star; and the a in this adjective tarry, or besmeared with tar, is as long as in the substantive tar, though short in the word tarry (to stay).

* Since the first publication of this Dictionary the publick have been favoured with some very elaborate and judicious observations on English pronunciation, by Mr. Smith, in a Scheme of a French and English Dictionary. In this work he departs frequently from my judgment, and particularly in the pronunciation of the letter a when succeeded by ss, st, or n, and another consonant, as pass, lass, chance, &c. to which he annexes the long sound of a in father. That this was the sound formerly, is highly probable from its being still the sound given it by the vulgar, who are generally the last to alter the common pronunciation; but that the short a in these words is now the general pronunciation of the polite and learned world, seems to be candidly acknowledged by Mr. Smith himself; and as every correct ear would be disgusted at giving the a in these words the full long sound of the a in father, any middle sound ought to be discountenanced, as tending to render the pronunciation of a language obscure and indefinite. (163.)

Ben Jonson in his Grammar classes salt, malt, balm, and calm, as having the same sound of a; and awnt as having the same diphthongal sound as audience, author, law, saw, draw, &c.

83. The third long sound of a is that which we more immediately derive from our maternal language the Saxon, but which at present we use less than any other: this is the a in fall, ball, gall, (33.) we find a correspondent sound to this a in the diphthongs au and av, as laud, law, saw, &c.; though it must here be noted, that we have improved upon our German parent, by giving a broader sound to this letter in these words than the Germans themselves would do, were they to pronounce them.

84. The long sound of the deep broad German a is produced by ll after it, as in all, wall, call; or, indeed by one l, and any other consonant, except the mute labials p, b, f, and v, as salt, bald, false, falchion, falcon, &c. The exceptions to this rule are generally words from the Arabick and Latin languages, as Alps, Albion, asphaltic, falcated, salve, calculate, amalgamate, Alcoran, and Alfred, &c.; the two last of which may be considered as ancient proper names which have been frequently latinized, and by this means have acquired a slenderer sound of a. This rule, however, must be understood of such syllables only as have the accent on them; for when al, followed by a consonant, is in the first syllable of a word, having the accent on the second, it is then pronounced as in the first syllables of al-ley, val-ley, &c. as alternate, balsamick, falcade, falcation, &c. Our modern orthography, which has done its utmost to perplex pronunciation, has made it necessary to observe, that every word compounded of a monosyllable with ll, as albeit, also, almost, doynfal, &c. must be pronounced as if the two liquids were still remaining, notwithstanding our word-menders have wisely taken one away, to the destruction both of sound and etymology; for, as Mr. Elphinston shrewdly observes, "Every reader, young and old, must now be so sagacious an analyst as to discern at once not only what are compounds and what their simples, but that al in composition is equal to all out of it; or in other words, that it is both what it is, and what it is not." Prin. Eng. Language, vol. I. page 60. See No. 406.

85. The w has a peculiar quality of broadening this letter, even when prepositive: this is always the effect, except when the vowel is closed by the sharp or flat guttural k or g, ng, nk, or the sharp labial f, as war, waft, thwack, twang, twank: thus we pronounce the a broad, though short in wad, wan, want, was, what, &c. and though other letters suffer the a to alter its sound before ll, when one of these letters goes to the formation of the latter syllable, as tall, tal-low; hall, hal-low; call, cal-low, &c.; yet we see w preserve the sound of this vowel before a single consonant, as wal-low, swal-low, &c.

86. The q including the sound of the w, and being no more than this letter preceded by k, ought, according to analogy, to broaden every a it goes before like the w; thus quantity ought to be pronounced as if written kwentity, and quality should rhyme with jollity; instead of which we frequently hear the w robbed of its rights in its proxy; and quality so pronounced as to rhyme with legality; while to rhyme quantity, according to this affected mode of pronouncing it, we must coin such words as plintity and consanquintity. The a in Quaver and Equator is an exception to this rule, from the preponderancy of another which requires a, ending a syllable under the accent, to have the slender sound of that letter; to which rule, father, master, and water, and perhaps, quadrant, are the only exceptions.

87. The short sound of this broad a is heard when it is preceded by w, and succeeded by a single consonant in the same syllable, as wal-low, swal-low, &c. or by two consonants in the same syllable, as want, vast, wasp, &c. but when l or r is one of the consonants, the a becomes long, as walk, swarm, &c.

Irregular and unaccented Sounds.

88. But besides the long and short sounds common to all the vowels, there is a certain transient indistinct pronunciation of some of them, when they are not accented, that cannot be so easily settled. When the accent is not upon it, no vowel is more apt to run into this imperfect sound than the a; thus the particle a before participles, in the phrases a-going, a-walking, a-shooting, &c. seems, says Dr. Lowth, to be the true and genuine preposition on a little disguised by familiar use and quick pronunciation: the same indistinctness, from rapidity and coincidence of sound, has confounded the pronunciation of this mutilated preposition to the ear, in the different questions what's o'clock, when we would know the hour, and what's a clock, when we would have the description of that horary machine; and if the accent be kept strongly on the first syllable of the word tolerable, as it always ought to be, we find scarcely any distinguishable difference to the ear, if we substitute u or o instead of a in the penultimate syllable. Thus tolerable, tolerable and tolerable, are exactly the same word to the ear, if pronounced without premeditation or transposing the accent, for the real purpose of distinction: and inwards, outwards, &c. might, with respect to sound, be spelt inurds, outurds, &c.

Thus the word man, when not under the accent, might be written mum in nobleman, husbandman, woman; and tertian and quartan, tertium and quartum, &c. The same observation will hold good in almost every final syllable where a is not accented, as medal, dial, giant, bias, &c. defiance, temperance, &c.; but when the final syllable ends in age, ate, or ace, the a goes into a somewhat different sound. See 90 and 91.

89. There is a corrupt, but a received pronunciation of this letter in the words any, many, Thames, where the a sounds like short e, as if written enny, menny, Tems. Catch, among Londoners, seems to have degenerated into Ketch; and says, the third person of the verb to say, has, among all ranks of people, and in every part of the united kingdoms, degenerated into sez, rhyming with Fez.

90. The a goes into a sound approaching the short i, in the numerous terminations in age, when the accent is not on it, as cabbage, village, courage, &c. and are pronounced nearly as if written cabbige, villige, courige, &c. The exceptions to this rule are chiefly among words of three syllables, with the accent on the first; these seem to be the following: Adage, presage, scutlage, hemorrhage, vassalage, carcelage, guidage, pucelage, mucilage, cartilage, pupilage, orphanage, villanage, appanage, concubinage, baronage, patronage, parsonage, personage, equipage, ossifrage, sauzifrage, umirage, embassage, hermitage, heritage, parentage, messuage.

91. The a in the numerous termination ate, when the accent is not on it, is pronounced somewhat differently in different words. If the word be a substantive, or an adjective, the a seems to be shorter than when it is a verb: thus a good ear will discover a difference in the quantity of this letter in delicate and dedicate; in climate, primate, and ultimate; and the verbs to calculate, to regulate, and to speculate, where we find the nouns and adjectives have the a considerably shorter than the verbs. Innate, however, preserves the a as long as if the accent were on it: but the unaccented terminations in ace, whether nouns or verbs, have the a so short and obscure as to be nearly similar to the u in us; thus palace, solace, menace, pinace, populace, might, without any great departure from their common sound, be written palus, solus, &c. while furnace almost changes the a into i, and might be written furnis.

92. When the a is preceded by the gutturals, hard g or c, it is, in polite pronunciation, softened by the intervention of a sound like e, so that card, cart, guard, regard, are pronounced like ke-ard, ghe-ard, re-ghe-ard. When the a is pronounced short, as in the first syllables of candle, gander, &c. the interposition of the e is very perceptible, and indeed unavoidable: for though we can pronounce guard and cart without interposing the e, it is impossible to pronounce garrison and carriage in the same manner. This sound of the a is taken notice of in Steele's Grammar, page 49. Nay, Ben Jonson remarks the same sound of this letter, which proves it is not the offspring of the present day (160:) and I have the satisfaction to find Mr. Smith, a very accurate inquirer into the subject, entirely of my opinion. But the sound of the a, which I have found the most difficult to appreciate, is that where it ends the syllable, either immediately before or after the accent. We cannot give it any of its three open sounds without hurting the ear: thus in pronouncing the words abound and diadem, ay-bound, ab-bound, and aw-bound; di-ay-dem, di-ah-dem and di-aw-dem, are all improper; but giving the a the second or Italian sound, as ah-bound, and di-ah-dem, seems the least so. For which reason I have, like Mr. Sheridan, adopted the short sound of this letter to mark this unaccented a: but if the unaccented a be final, which is not the case in any word purely English, it then seems to approach still nearer to the Italian a in the last syllable of papa, and to the a in father; as may be heard in the deliberate pronunciation of the words idea, Africa, Delta, &c. (88.) See the letter A at the beginning of the Dictionary.

93. The first sound of e is that which it has when lengthened by the mute e final, as in glebe, theme, &c. or when it ends a syllable with the accent upon it, as secresion, ad-he-sion, &c. (36.)

94. The exceptions to this rule are, the words where and there; in which the first e is pronounced like a, as if written whare, thare; and the auxiliary verb were, where the e has its short sound, as if written wer, rhyming with the last syllable of pre-fer, and ere, (before,) which sounds like air. When there is in composition in the word therefore, the e is generally shortened, as in were, but in my opinion improperly.

95. The short sound of e is that heard in bed, fed, red, wed, &c.; this sound before r is apt to slide into short u; and we sometimes hear mercy sounded as if written murcy: but this, though very near, is not the exact sound.

Irregular and unaccented Sounds.

96. The e at the end of the monosyllables be, he, me, we, is pronounced ee, as if written bee, hee, &c. It is silent at the end of words purely English, but is pronounced distinctly at the end of some words from the learned languages, as epitome, simile, catastrophe, apostrophe, &c.

97. The first e in the poetic contractions, e'er and ne'er is pronounced like a, as if written air and nair.

98. The e in her is pronounced nearly like short u; and as we hear it in the unaccented terminations of writer, reader, &c. pronounced as if written writur, readur, where we may observe that the r being only a r, and not a definite and distinct articulation like the other consonants, instead of stopping the vocal efflux of voice, lets it imperfectly pass, and so corrupts and alters the true sound of the vowel. The same may be observed of the final e after r in words ending in cre, gre, tre, where the e is sounded as if it were placed before the r, as in lucere, maugre, theatre, &c. pronounced lukur, maugur, theatur, &c. See No. 418. It may be remarked, that though we ought cautiously to avoid pronouncing the e like u when under the accent, it would be nimis Atticè, and border too much on affectation of accuracy to preserve this sound of e in unaccented syllables before r; and though terrible, where e has the accent, should never be pronounced as if written turrible, it is impossible without pedantry to make any difference in the sound of the last syllable of splendour and tender, sulphur and suffer, martyr and garter. But there is a small deviation from rule when this letter begins a word, and is followed by a double consonant with the accent on the second syllable: in this case we find the vowel lengthen as if the consonant were single. See Ejace, Despatch, Embalm.

99. This vowel, in a final unaccented syllable, is apt to slide into the short i: thus faces, ranges, praises, are pronounced as if written facis, rangis, praisis; poet, covet, linen, duel, &c. as if written poit, covit, linin, duil, &c. Where we may observe, that though the e goes into the short sound of i, it is exactly that sound which corresponds to the long sound of e. See Port-Royal Grammar, Latin, page 142.

100. There is a remarkable exception to the common sound of this letter in the words clerk, serjeant, and a few others, where we find the e pronounced like the a in dark and margin. But this exception, I imagine, was, till within these few years, the general rule of sounding this letter before r, followed by another consonant. See Merchant. Thirty years ago every one pronounced the first syllable of merchant like the monosyllable marsh, and as it was anciently written marchant. Service and servant are still heard among the lower order of speakers, as if written sarvice and sarvant; and even among the better sort, we hear sometimes the salutation, Sir, your sarvant! though this pronunciation of the word singly would be looked upon as a mark of the lowest vulgarity. The proper names, Derby and Berkeley, still retain the old sound as if written Darby and Barkley; but even these, in polite usage, are getting into the common sound, nearly as if written Durby and Burkely. As this modern pronunciation of the e has a tendency to simplify the language by lessening the number of exceptions, it ought certainly to be indulged.

101. This letter falls into an irregular sound, but still a sound which is its nearest relation, in the words, England, yes, and pretty, where the e is heard like short i. Vulgar speakers are guilty of the same irregularity in engine, as if written ingine; but this cannot be too carefully avoided.

102. The vowel e before l and n in the final unaccented syllable, by its being sometimes suppressed and sometimes not, forms one of the most puzzling difficulties in pronunciation. When any of the liquids precede these letters, the e is heard distinctly, as woollen, flannel, women, syren; but when any of the other consonants come before these letters, the e is sometimes heard, as in novel, sudden; and sometimes not, as in swivel, raven, &c. As no other rule can be given for this variety of pronunciation, perhaps the best way will be to draw the line between those words where e is pronounced, and those where it is not; and this, by the help of the Rhyming Dictionary, I am luckily enabled to do. In the first place, then, it may be observed, the e before l, in a final unaccented syllable, must always be pronounced distinctly, except in the following words: Shekel, weasel, ousel, nousel, (better written nozele), nazel, ravel, snivel, rivel, drivel, shrivel, skovel, grovel, hazel, dazel, snivel. These words are pronounced as if the e were omitted by an apostrophe, as shek'l, weas'l, ous'l, &c. or rather as if written sheckle, weazle, ouzele, &c.; but as these are the only words of this termination that are so pronounced, great care must be taken that we do not pronounce travel, gravel, rebel, (the substantive,) parcel, chapel, and vessel, in the same manner; a fault to which many are very prone.

103. E before n in a final unaccented syllable and not preceded by a liquid, must always be suppressed in the verbal terminations in en, as to loosen, to hearken, and in other words, except the following: Sudden, myunchen, kitchen, hyphen, chicken, ticken, (better written ticking), jerken, aspen, platen, paten, marten, latten, paten, leaven or leven, sloven, mittens. In these words the e is heard distinctly, contrary to the general rule which suppresses he in these syllables, when preceded by a mute, as hard'en, heath'en, heav'n, &c.; nay, even when preceded by a liquid in the words fallen and stolen, where the e is suppressed, as if they were written fall'n, and stol'n: garden and burden, therefore, are very analogically pronounced gard'n and burd'n: and this pronunciation ought the rather to be indulged, as we always hear the e suppressed in gardener and burdensome, as if written gard'ner, and burd'nsome. See No. 472.

104. This diversity in the pronunciation of these terminations ought the more carefully to be attended to, as nothing is so vulgar and childish as to hear suivel and heaven pronounced with the e distinctly, or novel and chicken with the e suppressed. But the most general suppression of this letter is in the preterits of verbs, and in participles ending in ed: here, when the e is not preceded by d or t, the e is almost universally sunk, (362,) and the two final consonants are pronounced in one syllable: thus loved, lived, barred, married, are pronounced as if written lovd, livd, bard, mar'd. The same may be observed of this letter when silent in the singulars of nouns, or the first persons of verbs, as theme, make, &c. which form themes in the plural, and makes in the third person, &c. where the last e is silent, and the words are pronounced in one syllable. When the noun or first person of the verb ends in y, with the accent on it, the e is likewise suppressed, as a reply, two replies, he replies, &c. When words of this form have the accent on the preceding syllables, the e is suppressed and the y pronounced like short i, as cherries, marries, carries, &c. pronounced cherri'z, marri'z, carriz, &c. In the same manner, carried, married, embodied, &c. are pronounced as if written carri'd, marri'd, embodi'd, &c. (282.) But it must be carefully noted, that there is a remarkable exception to many of these contractions when we are pronouncing the language of Scripture: here every participial ed ought to make a distinct syllable, where it is not preceded by a vowel: thus, "Who hath believed our report, and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" Here the participles are both pronounced in three syllables; but in the following passage, "Whom he did predestinate, them he also called:" and whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified:" called preserves the e, and is pronounced in two syllables; and justified and glorified suppress the e, and are pronounced in three.

I.

105. This letter is a perfect diphthong, composed of the sounds of a in father, and e in he, pronounced as closely together as possible (37.) When these sounds are openly pronounced, they produce the familiar assent ay: which, by the old English dramatick writers, was often expressed by I: hence we may observe, that unless our ancestors pronounced the vowel I like the e in oil, the present pronunciation of the word ay in the House of Commons, in the phrase, The Ayes have it, is contrary to ancient as well as to present usage: such a pronunciation of this word is now coarse and rustick. This sound is heard when the letter is lengthened by final e, as time, thine, or ending a syllable with the accent upon it, as ti-tle, di-al; in monosyllables ending with nd, as bind, find, mind, &c.; in three words ending with ld, as child, mild, wild; and in one very irregularly ending with nt, as pint. (37.)

106. There is one instance where this letter, though succeeded by final e, does not go into the broad English sound like the noun eye, but into the slender foreign sound like e. This is in the word shire, pronounced as if written sheer, both when single, as a knight of the shire; or in composition, as in Nottinghamshire, Leicestershire, &c. This is the sound Dr. Lowth gives it in his Grammar, page 4: and it is highly probable that the simple shire acquired this slender sound from its tendency to become slender in the compounds, where it is at a distance from the accent, and where all the vowels have a natural tendency to become short and obscure. See Shire.

107. The short sound of this letter is heard in him, thin, &c. and when ending an unaccented syllable, as van-i-ty, qual-i-ty, &c. where, though it cannot be properly said to be short, as it is not closed by a consonant, yet it has but half its diphthongal sound. This sound is the sound of e, the last letter of the diphthong that forms the long I; and it is not a little surprising that Dr. Johnson should say that the short i was a sound wholly different from the long one. (551.)

108. When this letter is succeeded by r, and another consonant not in a final syllable, it has exactly the sound of e in vermin, vernal, &c. as virtue, virgin, &c. which approaches to the sound of short u; but when it comes before r followed by another consonant in a final syllable, it acquires the sound of u exactly, as bird, dir't, shirt, squir't, &c. Mirth, birth, gird, girl, skirt, girl, whirl and firm, are the only exceptions to this rule, where i is pronounced like e, and as if the words were written, merth, berth, and ferm.

109. The letter r, in this case, seems to have the same influence on this vowel, as it evidently has on a and o. When these vowels come before double r, or single r, followed by a vowel, as in arable, carry, marry, orator, horrid, forage, &c. they are considerably shorter than when the r is the final letter of the word, or when it is succeeded by another consonant, as in arbour, car, mar, or nor, for. In the same manner the i, coming before either double r, or single r, followed by a vowel, preserves its pure, short sound, as in irritate, spirit, conspiracy, &c.; but when r is followed by another consonant, or is the final letter of a word with the accent upon it, the i goes into a deeper and broader sound, equivalent to short e, as heard in virgin, virtue, &c. So fir, a tree, is perfectly similar to the first syllable of ferment, though often corruptly pronounced like fur, a skin. Sir and stir are exactly pronounced as if written sar and stur. It seems, says Mr. Nares, that our ancestors distinguished these sounds more correctly. Bishop Gardiner, in his first letter to Cheke, mentions a witticism of Nicholas Rowley, a fellow Cantab with him, to this effect: "Let handsome girls be called virgins, plain ones vurgins."

"Si pulchra est, virgo, sin turpis, vurgo vocetur."

Which, says Mr. Elphinston, may be modernized by the aid of a far more celebrated line:

"Sweet virgin can alone the fair express,
Fine by degrees, and beautifully less:
But let the hoyden, homely, rough-hewn vurgin, Engross the homage of a Major Sturgeon."

110. The sound of i in this situation, ought to be the more carefully attended to, as letting it fall into the sound of u, where it should have the sound of e, has a grossness in it approaching to vulgarity. Perhaps the only exception to this rule is, when the succeeding vowel is u; for this letter, being a semi-consonant, has some influence on the preceding i, though not so much as a perfect consonant would have. This makes Mr. Sheridan's pronunciation of the i in virulent and its compounds, like that in virgin, less exceptionable than I at first thought it; but since we cannot give a semi-sound of short i to correspond to the semi-consonant sound of u, I have preferred the pure sound which I think the most agreeable to polite usage. See Mr. Garrick's Epigram upon the sound of this letter, under the word Virtue.

Irregular and unaccented Sounds.

111. There is an irregular pronunciation of this letter which has greatly multiplied within these few years, and that is, the slender sound heard in ee. This sound is chiefly found in words derived from the French and Italian languages; and we think we show our breeding by a knowledge of those tongues, and an ignorance of our own:

"Report of fashions in proud Italy,
Whose manners still our tardy apish nation
Limps after, in base awkward imitation."
Shakspeare, Richard II.

When Lord Chesterfield wrote his letters to his son, the word oblige was, by many polite speakers, pronounced as if written obleege, to give a hint of their knowledge of the French language; nay, Pope has rhymed it to this sound:

"Dreading ev'n fools, by flatterers besieg'd,
And so obliging, that he ne'er oblig'd."

But it was so far from having generally obtained, that Lord Chesterfield strictly enjoins his son to avoid this pronunciation as affected. In a few years, however, it became so general, that none but the lowest vulgar ever pronounced it in the English manner; but, upon the publication of this nobleman's letters, which was about twenty years after he wrote them, his authority has had so much influence with the polite world as to bid fair for restoring the i, in this word, to its original rights; and we not unfrequently hear it now pronounced with the broad English i, in those circles where, a few years ago, it would have been an infallible mark of vulgarity. Mr. Sheridan, W. Johnston, and Mr. Barclay give both sounds, but place the sound of oblige first. Mr. Scott gives both, but places oblige first. Dr. Kenrick and Buchanan give only oblige; and Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Perry, and Fenning, give only oblige; but though this sound has lost ground so much, yet Mr. Nares, who wrote about eighteen years ago, says, "oblige, still, I think, retains the sound of long e, notwithstanding the proscription of that pronunciation by the late Lord Chesterfield."

112. The words that have preserved the foreign sound of i, like double ee, are the following: Ambergris, verdgris, antique, beccafico, bombasin, brazil, capivi, capuchin, coberline, chioppine, or chopin, caprice, chagrin, chevaux-de-frise, critique, (for criticism,) festucine, frize, gabardine, haberdine, sordine, rugine, trophine, quarantine, routine, fascine, fatigue, intrigue, glaciis, invalid, machine, magazine, marine, palanquin, pique, police, profile, recitative, man-dar-ne, tabourine, tambourine, tonline, transmarine, ultramarine. In all these words, if for the last i we substitute ee, we shall have the true pronunciation. In signior the first i is thus pronounced. Mr. Sheridan pronounces vertigo and serpigo with the accent on the second syllable, and the i long as in tie and pie. Dr. Kenrick gives these words the same accent, but sounds the i as e in tea and pea. The latter is, in my opinion, the general pronunciation; though Mr. Sheridan's is supported by a very general rule, which is, that all words adopted whole from the Latin preserve the Latin accent. (503, b.) But if the English ear were unbiased by the long i in Latin, which fixes the accent on the second syllable, and could free itself from the slavish imitation of the French and Italians, there is little doubt but these words would have the accent on the first syllable, and that the i would be pronounced regularly like the short e, as in Indigo and Portico. See Vertigo.

113. There is a remarkable alteration in the sound of this vowel, in certain situations, where it changes to a sound equivalent to initial y. The situation that occasions this change is, when the i precedes another vowel in an unaccented syllable, and is not preceded by any of the dentals: thus we hear iary in mil-iary, bil-iary, &c. pronounced as if written mil-yary, bil-yary, &c. Minton and pin-ion as if written min-yon and pin-yon. In these words the i is so totally altered to y, that pronouncing the ia and io in separate syllables would be an error, as most palpable; but where the other liquids or mutes precede the i in this situation, the coalition is not so necessary: for though the two latter syllables of convivial, participial, &c. are extremely prone to unite into one, they may, however, be separated, provided the separation be not too distant. The same observations hold good of e, as malleable, pronounced mal-y-able.

114. But the sound of the i, the most difficult to reduce to rule, is when it ends a syllable immediately before the accent. When either the primary or secondary accent is on this letter, it is invariably pronounced either as the long i in title, the short i in little, or the French i in magazine; and when it ends a syllable after the accent, it is always sounded like e, as sen-si-ble, ra-ti-fy, &c. But when it ends a syllable, immediately before the accent, it is sometimes pronounced long, as in vi-ta-li-ty, where the first syllable is exactly like the first of vi-al; and sometimes short, as in di-gest, where the i is pronounced as if the word were written de-gest. The sound of the i, in this situation, is so little reducible to rule, that none of our writers on the subject have attempted it: and the only method to give some idea of it, seems to be: very laborious one of classing such words together as have the i pronounced in the same manner, and observing the different combinations of other letters that may possibly be the cause of the different sounds of this.

115. In the first place, where the i is the only letter in the first syllable, and the accent is on the second, beginning with a consonant, the vowel has its long diphthongal sound, as in idea, identity, idolatry, idoneous, trasabile, ironical, isosceles, itinerant, itinerary. Imagine and its compounds seem the only exceptions. But to give the inspector some idea of general usage, I have subjoined examples of these words, as they stand in our different Pronouncing Dictionaries:

| idea . | Sheridan, Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnston, Kenrick. |
| identity . | Perry |
| | Sheridan, Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnston, Kenrick. |
| identity . | Perry |
| idolatry . | Sheridan, Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnston, Kenrick. |
| idolatry . | Perry |
| idoneous . | Sheridan, Kenrick |
| trasabile . | Sheridan, Scott, W. Johnston, Kenrick. |

116. When i ends the first syllable, and the accent is on the second, commencing with a vowel, it generally preserves its long open diphthongal sound. Thus in di-amer, di-urnal, &c. the first syllable is equivalent to the verb to die. A corrupt, foreign manner of pronouncing these words, may sometimes mince the i into e, as if the words were written de-amer, de-urnal, &c.; but this is disgusting to every just English ear, and contrary to the whole current of analogy. Besides, the vowel that ends and the vowel that begins a syllable, are, by pronouncing the i long, kept more distinct, and not suffered to coalesce, as they are apt to do if it has its slender sound. This proneness of the e, which is exactly the slender sound of i, to coalesce with the succeeding vowel, has produced such monsters in pronunciation as jogography and jonne try, for geography and geometry, and jorgics for georgics. The latter of these words is fixed in this absurd pronunciation without remedy; but the two former seem recovering their right to four syllables; though Mr. Sheridan has endeavoured to deprive them of it, by spelling them with three. Hence we may observe, that those who wish to pronounce correctly, and according to analogy, ought to pronounce the first syllable of biography, as the verb to buy, and not as if written be-ography.

117. When i ends an initial syllable without the accent, and the succeeding syllable begins with a consonant, the i is generally slender, as if written e. But the exceptions to this rule are so numerous, that nothing but a catalogue will give a tolerable idea of the state of pronunciation in this point.

118. When the prepositive bi, derived from bis, (twice,) ends a syllable immediately before the accent, the i is long and broad, in order to convey more precisely the specific meaning of the syllable. Thus bi-capsular, bi-cipital, bi-cipitous, bi-cornous, bi-corporal, bi-dental, bi-farious, bifurcated, bi-linguous, bi-nocular, bi-pennated, bi-petalous, bi-quadrate, have the i long. But the first syllable of the words Bitumen and Bituminous having no such signification, ought to be pronounced with the i short. This is the sound Buchanan has given it; but Sheridan, Kenrick, and W. Johnston, make the i long, as in Bible.

119. The same may be observed of words beginning with tri, having the accent on the second syllable. Thus tri-bunal, tri-corporal, tri-chotomy, tri-gintals, have the i ending the first syllable long, as in tri-al. To this class ought to be added, di-petalous and di-lemma, though the i in the first syllable of the last word is pronounced like e, and as if written de-lemma, by Mr. Scott and Mr. Perry, but long by Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, and Buchanan; and both ways by W. Johnston, but placing the short first. And hence we may conclude that the verb to bi-sect, and the noun bi-section, ought to have the i at the end of the first syllable pronounced like buy, as Mr. Scott and Dr. Kenrick have marked it, though otherwise marked by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Perry, and Buchanan.

120. When the first syllable is chi, with the accent on the second, the i is generally long, as chi-rurgical, chi-rurgic, chi-rurgeon, chi-rographist, chi-rographer, chi-rography. Chi-mera and chi-merical have the i most frequently short, as pronounced by Buchanan and Perry, though otherwise marked by Sheridan, Scott, W. Johnston, and Kenrick; and, indeed, the short sound seems now established. Chicane and chicanery, from the French, have the i always short; or more properly slender.

121. Ci before the accent has the i generally short, as ci-vilian, ci-vility, and, I think, ci-cilious and ci-nerent, though otherwise marked by Mr. Sheridan. Ci-barious and ci-tation have the i long.

122. Cli before the accent has the i long, as cli-master; but when the accent is on the third syllable, as in climacteric, the i is shortened by the secondary accent. See 530.

123. Cri before the accent has the i generally long, as cri-nigerous, cri-terion; though we sometimes hear the latter as if written cre-terion, but I think improperly.

124. Di before the accented syllable, beginning with a consonant, has the i almost always short: as digest, digestion, digress, digression, dilute, dilution, diluvian, dimension, dimensive, dimidiation, diminish, diminutive, diploma, direct, direction, diversity, diversification, diversion, diversity, direct, divertissement, divertive, divest, divesture, divide, dividable, dividant, divine, divinity, divisible, divisibility, divinity, didactic, dilacerate, dilaceration, dilanate, dilapidation, dilate, dilatable, dilatability, dilection, dilucid, dilucidate, dilucidation, dictional, dinumeration, diverge, divergent, divan; though Mr. Sheridan has marked the first i in all these words long; some of them may undoubtedly be pronounced either way; but why he should make the i in diploma long, and W. Johnston should give it both ways, is unaccountable; as Mr. Scott, Buchanan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, and the general usage, are against them. Diaeresis and dioptricks have the i long, according to the general rule, (116,) though the last is absurdly made short by Dr. Kenrick, and the diphthong is made long in the first by Mr. Sheridan, contrary to one of the most prevailing idioms in pronunciation; which is, the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent. (503.) Let it not be said that the diphthong must be always long, since Casarea, and Dedalus have the a always short.

125. The long i, in words of this form, seems confined to the following: Digladiation, adjudication, dinumeration, dissociate, direption, dirruption. Both Johnson and Sheridan, in my opinion, place the accent of the word didascalick improperly upon the second syllable; it should seem more agreeable to analogy to class it with the numerous terminations in ick, and place the accent on the penultimate syllable (509); and, in this case, the i in the first will be shortened by the secondary accent, and the syllable pronounced like did. (527.) The first i in dimissory, marked long by Mr. Sheridan, and with the accent on the second syllable, contrary to Dr. Kenrick, is equally erroneous. The accent ought to be on the first syllable, and the i short, as on the adjective dim. See Possessory.

126. Fi, before the accent, ought always to be short: this is the sound we generally give to the i in the first syllable of fi-delity; and why we should give the long sound to the i in fiducial and fiduciary, as marked by Mr. Sheridan, I know not: he is certainly erroneous in marking the first i in frigidify long, and equally so in placing the accent upon the last syllable of finite. Finance has the i short universally.

127. Gigantic has the i in the first syllable always long.

128. Li has the i generally long, as li-bation, li-brarian, li-bration, li-centious, li-poethymy, li-quescent, li-thography, li-thotomy. Litigious has the i in the first syllable always short. The same may be observed of libidinous, though otherwise marked by Mr. Sheridan.

129. Mi has the i generally short, as in minority, mittia, minigrapher, minacious, minacity, miraculous; though the four last are marked with the long i by Mr. Sheridan; and what is still more strange, he marks the i which has the accent on it long in minatory; though the same word, in the compound comminatory, where the i is always short, might have shown him its error. The word mimetic, which, though in very good use, is neither in Johnson nor Sheridan, ought to be pronounced with the first i short, as if written mim-et-ic. The i is generally long in micrometer, micrography, and migration.

130. Ni has the i long in nigrescent. The first i in nigritication, though marked long by Mr. Sheridan, is shortened by the secondary accent (527), and ought to be pronounced as if divided into nig-ri-fi-cation.

131. Phi has the i generally short, as in philanthropy, philippic, philosopher, philosophy, philosophize: to which we may certainly add, philologer, philologist, philology, philological, notwithstanding Mr. Sheridan has marked the i in these last words long.

132. Pi and pli have the i generally short, as pilaster, pituitous, pilosity, plication. Piaster, and piazza, being Italian words, have the i short before the vowel, contrary to the analogy of words of this form, (116,) where the i is long, as in pi-acular, pri-ority, &c. Piratical has the i marked long by Mr. Sheridan, and short by Dr. Kenrick. The former is, in my opinion, more agreeable both to custom and analogy, as the sound of the i before the accent is often determined by the sound of that letter in the primitive word.

133. Pri has the i generally long, as in primeval, primevous, primitival, primero, primordial, privado, privation, privative, but always short in primitive, and primer.

134. Ri has the i short, as in ridiculous. Rigidity is marked with the i long by Mr. Sheridan, and short by Dr. Kenrick: the latter is undoubtedly right. Rivality has the i long in the first syllable, in compliment to real, as piratical has the i long, because derived from pirate. Rhinoceros has the i long in Sheridan, Scott, Kenrick, W. Johnston, and Buchanan; and short in Perry.

135. Si has the i generally short, as similitude, siriasis, and ought certainly to be short in silicious, (better written cilicious), though marked long by Sheridan. Simultaneous having the secondary accent on the first syllable, does not come under this head, but retains the i long, notwithstanding the shortening power of the accent it is under. (527.)

136. Ti has the i short, as in timidity.

137. Tri has the i long, for the same reason as bi, which see. (118) (19.)

138. Vi has the i so unsettled as to puzzle the correctest speakers. The i is generally long in vicarious, notwithstanding the short i in vicar. It is long in vibration, from its relation to vibrate. Vitality has the i long, like vital. In vivify, vivificate, and viviparous, the first i is long, to avoid too great a sameness with the second. Vicious and vicinity have the i almost as often long as short; Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Dr. Kenrick, make the i in vicarious long, and Mr. Perry and Buchanan short; Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and W. Johnston, make the i in the first of vivacity long, and Perry and Buchanan short: but the short sound seems less formal and most agreeable to polite usage. Vicinity, vicinal, vicissitude, vituperate, vineous, and virago, seem to prefer the short i, though Mr. Sheridan has marked the three last words with the first vowel long. But the diversity will be best seen by giving the authorities for all these words.

Vicinity. Dr. Kenrick.

Vicinity. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnston, and Perry.

Vicinal. Mr. Sheridan.

Vicissitude. Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Buchanan, and Perry.

Vituperate. Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston.

Vituperate. Mr. Perry.

Vineous. Mr. Sheridan.

Virago. Mr. Sheridan and W. Johnston.

Virago. Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, Buchanan, and Perry.

I have classed vicinal here as a word with the accent on the second syllable, as it stands in Sheridan's Dictionary, but think it ought to have the accent on the first. See Medicinal.

139. The same diversity and uncertainty in the sound of this letter seem to reign in those final unaccented syllables which are terminated with the mute e. Perhaps the best way to give some tolerable idea of the analogy of the language in this point, will be, to show the general rule, and mark the exceptions; though these are sometimes so numerous as to make us doubt of the rule itself; therefore the best way will be to give a catalogue of both.

140. There is one rule of very great extent, in words of this termination, which have the accent on the penultimate syllable, and that is, that the i in the final syllable of these words is short: thus servile, hostile, virile, respite, deposite, adamantine, amethystine, &c. are pronounced as if written servil, hostil, viril, respit, deposi, &c. The only exceptions in this numerous class of words seem to be the following: Exile, senile, edile, empire, umpire, rampire, finite, feline, ferine, archives; and the substantives confine and stipine: while the adjectives saline and concrete have sometimes the accent on the first, and sometimes on the last syllable; but in either case the i is long. Quagmire and pismire have the i long also; likewise has the i long, but otherwise has it more frequently, though very improperly, short. Myrrhine, vulpine, and gentile, though marked with the i long by Mr. Sheridan, ought, in my opinion, to conform to the general rule, and be pronounced with the i short. Vulpine, with the i long, is adopted by Mr. Scott; and W. Johnston, Mr. Scott, and Buchanan, agree with Mr. Sheridan in the last syllable of gentile; and this seems agreeable to general usage, though not to analogy. See the word.

That the reader may have a distinct view of the subject, I have been at the pains of collecting all our dissyllables of this termination, with the Latin words from which they are derived, by which we may see the correspondence between the English and Latin quantity in these words:

|-----------------|------------|------------------|-------------|
| flabile, - - - | flabilis, | reptile, - - - | reptilis, |
| debile, - - - | debilis, | sculptile, - - - | sculptilis, |
| mobile, - - - | mobilis, | fertile, - - - | fertilis, |
| sorbile, - - - | sorbilis, | futile, - - - | fuilis, |
| nubile, - - - | nubilis, | utile, - - - | utilis, |
| facile, - - - | facilis, | textile, - - - | textilis, |
| gracile, - - - | gracilis, | gentile, - - - | gentilis, |
| docile, - - - | docilis, | ædile, - - - | ædilis, |
| agile, - - - | agilis, | senile, - - - | senilis, |
| fragile, - - - | fragilis, | febrile, - - - | febrilis, |
| pensile, - - - | pensilis, | virile, - - - | virilis, |
| tortile, - - - | tortilis, | subtile, - - - | subtilis, |
| scissile, - - - | scissilis, | cottile, - - - | cottilis, |
| missile, - - - | missilis, | quintile, - - - | quintilis, |
| tactile, - - - | tactilis, | hostile, - - - | hostilis, |
| fictile, - - - | fictilis, | servile, - - - | servilis, |
| ductile, - - - | ductilis, | sextile, - - - | sextilis, |

In this list of Latin adjectives, we find only five of them with the penultimate i long; and four of them with the i in the last syllable long, in the English words gentile, ædile, senile, and virile. It is highly probable that this short i, in the Latin adjectives, was the cause of adopting this i in the English words derived from them; and this tendency is a sufficient reason for pronouncing the words projectile, tractile, and insectile, with the i short, though we have no classical Latin words to appeal to, from which they are derived.

141. But when the accent is on the last syllable but two in words of this termination, the length of the vowel is not so easily ascertained.

142. Those ending in ice have the i short, except sacrifice and cockatrice.

143. Those ending in ide have the i long, notwithstanding we sometimes hear suicide absurdly pronounced, as if written suicid.

144. Those ending in ife have the i long, except housewife, pronounced huzziſ, according to the general rule, notwithstanding the i in wife is always long. Midwife is sometimes shortened in the same manner by the vulgar; and se'nnight for seventnight is gone irrevocably into the same analogy, though fortnight for fourteenthnight is more frequently pronounced with the i long.

145. Those ending in ile have the i short, except reconcile, chamomile, colipile. Juvenile, mercantile, and puerile, have the i long in Sheridan's Dictionary, and short in Kenrick's. In my opinion the latter is the much more prevalent and polite pronunciation; but infantile, though pronounceable both ways, seems inclinable to lengthen the i in the last syllable. See Juvenile.

146. In the termination ime, pantomime has the i long, rhyming with time; and maritime has the i short, as if written maritim.

147. Words in ine, that have the accent higher than the penultimate, have the quantity of i so uncertain, that the only method to give an idea of it will be to exhibit a catalogue of words where it is pronounced differently.

148. But first it may not be improper to see the different sounds given to this letter in some of the same words by different orthoepists:

|----------------------|----------------------------------|
| Columbine . | Sheridan, Nares, W. Johnston. |
| Columbine . | Kenrick, Perry. |
| Saccharine . | Sheridan, Nares. |
| Saccharine . | Kenrick, Perry. |
| Saturnine . | Sheridan, Nares, Buchanan. |
| Saturnine . | Kenrick, Perry. |
| Metaline . | Kenrick. |
| Metaline . | Sheridan, W. Johnston, Perry. |
| Crystalline . | Kenrick. |
| Crystalline . | Sheridan, Perry. |
| Uterine . | Sheridan, Buchanan, W. Johnston. |
| Uterine . | Kenrick, Scott, Perry. |

149. In these words I do not hesitate to pronounce, that the general rule inclines evidently to the long i, which, in doubtful cases, ought always to be followed; and for which reason I shall enumerate those words first where I judge the i ought to be pronounced long: Canabine, carabine, columbine, bizantine, gelatine, legatine, oxyrrhodine, concubine, muscadine, incarnadine, celandine, almandine, secundine, amalgadine, crystalline, vituline, calamine, asinine, saturnine, saccharine, adulterine, viperine, uterine, lamentine, argentine, serpentine, turpentine, vespertine, belluine, porcupine, countermine, leonine, sapphirine, and metalline.

150. The words of this termination, where the i is short, are the following: Jacobine, medicine, discipline, masculine, jessamine, feminine, heroine, nectarine, libertine, genuine, hyaline, palatine. To these, I think, ought to be added, alkaline, aquiline, coralline, brigitine, eglantine: to this pronunciation of the i, the proper names, Valentine and Constantine, seem strongly to incline; and on the stage Cymbeline has entirely adopted it. Thus we see how little influence the Latin language has on the quantity of the i in the final syllable of these words. It is a rule in that language, that adjectives ending in ilis or inus, derived from animated beings or proper names, to the exception of very few, have this pronounced long. It were to be wished this distinction could be adopted in English words from the Latin, as in that case we might be able in time to regularize this very irregular part of our tongue; but this alteration would be almost impossible in adjectives ending in ine, as relative, vocative, fugitive, &c. have the i uniformly short in English, and long in the Latin, relativus, vocativus, fugitivus, &c.

151. The only word ending in ire, with the accent on the antepenultimate syllable, is acrosquire, with the i long, the last syllable sounding like the spire of a church.

152. Words ending in ise have the i short, when the accent is on the last syllable but one, as franchise, except the compounds ending in wise, as likewise, lengthwise, &c. as marked by Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, and Buchanan: but even among these words we sometimes hear otherwise pronounced otherwiz, as marked by Mr. Sheridan and W. Johnston; but, I think, improperly.

153. When the accent is on the last syllable but two in these words, they are invariably pronounced with the i long, as criticise, equalise.

154. In the termination ite, when the accent is on it, the i is always long, as requite. When the accent is on the last syllable but one, it is always short, as respite, (140.) pronounced as if written respit, except contrite and crintite; but when the accent is on the last syllable but two, the i is generally long: the exceptions, however, are so many, that a catalogue of both will be the best rule.

155. The i is long in expedite, recondite, incondite, hermaphrodite, Carmelite, theodolite, cosmopolite, chrysolite, eremite, aconite, margarite, marcasite, parasite, apelite, bipartite, tripartite, quadrupartite, convertite, anchortite, pituitite, satellite. As the word stands in Kenrick's Dictionary sa-tell-it, having the i short, and the accent on the second syllable, it is doubly wrong. The i in the last syllable is shortened also by W. Johnston and Perry, but made long, as it ought to be, by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Nares. See Recondite.

156. The i is short in cucurbit, ingenite, definite, indefinite, infinite, hypocrite, favourite, requisite, pre-requisite, perquisite, exquisite, opposite, and opposite. Heteroclit has the i long in Sheridan, but short in Kenrick. The former is, in my opinion, the best pronunciation, (see the word in the Dictionary); but ite, in what may be called a gentile termination, have the i always long, as in Hivite, Sannite, cosmopolite, bedlamite, &c.

157. The termination ive, when the accent is on it, is always long, as in hive, except in the two verbs give, live, and their compounds, giving, living, &c.; for the adjective live, as a live animal, has the i long, and rhymes with strive; so have the adjective and adverb, lively, and livelily: the noun livelihood follows the same analogy; but the adjective live-long, as the live-long day, has the i short, as in the verb. When the accent is not on the i in this termination it, is always short, as sportive, plaintive, &c. rhyming with give (150.) except the word be a gentile, as Argive.

158. All the other adjectives and substantives of this termination, when the accent is not on it, have the i invariably short, as offensive, defensive, &c. The i in salique is short, as if written sallique, but long in oblique, rhyming with pique, strike, &c.; while antique has the i long and slender, and rhymes with speake. Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, and Barclay, have obleeke for oblique; Mr. Scott has it both ways, but gives the slender sound first; and Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, and W. Johnston, oblike. The latter is, in my opinion, more agreeable to polite usage, but the former more analogical; for as it comes from the French oblique, we cannot write it oblike, as Mr. Nares wishes, any more than antique, antike, for fear of departing too far from the Latin antiquus and obliquus. Opaque, Mr. Nares observes, has become opake; but then it must be remembered, that the Latin is opacus and not opagus.

159. All the terminations in ize have the i long, except to endelize; which, having the accent on the second syllable, follows the general rule, and has the i short, pronounced as in the verb is, (140.) To these observations we may add, that though evil and devil suppress the i, as if written evl and devl, yet that cavil and pencil preserve its sound distinctly; and that Latin ought never to be pronounced as it is generally at schools, as if written Latt'a. Cousin and eczen both drop the last vowels, as if spelled cozn, and are only distinguishable to the eye.

Thus we see how little regularity there is in the sound of this letter when it is not under the accent; and, when custom will permit, how careful we ought to be to preserve the least trace of analogy, that "confusion may not be worse confounded." The sketch that has been just given may, perhaps, afford something like a clew to direct us in this labyrinth, and it is hoped it will enable the judicious speaker to pronounce with more certainty and decision.

160. It was remarked under the vowel A, that when a hard g or c preceded that vowel, a sound like e interposed, the better to unite the letters, and soften the sound of the consonant. The same may be observed of the letter I. When this vowel is preceded by hard g or k, which is but another form for hard c, it is pronounced as if an e were inserted between the consonant and the vowel: thus, sky, kind, guide, guise, disguise, catechise, guile, beguile, man-kind, are pronounced as if written ske-y, ke-ind, gue-ise, disgue-ise, catec-che-ise, gue-ile, be-gue-ile, manke-ind. At first we are surprised that two such different letters as a and i should be affected in the same manner by the hard gutturals g, c, and k; but when we reflect that i is really composed of a and e, (37.) our surprise ceases; and we are pleased to find the ear perfectly uniform in its procedure, and entirely unbiased by the eye. From this view of the analogy we may see how greatly mistaken is a very solid and ingenious writer on this subject, who says, that "ky-ind for kind is a monster of pronunciation, heard only on our stage." Nares' English Orthoepy, page 28. Dr. Beattie, in his Theory of Language, takes notice of this union of vowel sounds, page 266. See No. 92.

It may not, perhaps, seem unworthy of notice, that when this letter is unaccented in the numerous terminations ity, ible, &c. it is frequently pronounced like short u, as if the words sensible, visible, &c. were written sensubile, visubile, &c.; and charity, chastity, &c. like charutty, chastutty, &c.: but it may be observed, that the pure sound of i like e in these words is as much the mark of an elegant speaker as that of the u in singular, educate, &c. See No. 179.

O.

161. Grammarians have generally allowed this letter but three sounds. Mr. Sheridan instances them in not, note, prove. For a fourth, I have added the o in love, dove, &c.; for the fifth, that in or, nor, for : and a sixth, that in woman, wolf, &c.

162. The first and only peculiar sound of this letter is that by which it is named in the alphabet: it requires the mouth to be formed, in some degree, like the letter, in order to pronounce it. This may be called its long open sound, as the o in prove may be called its long slender sound. (65.) This sound we find in words ending with silent e, as tone, bone, alone ; or when ending a syllable with the accent upon it, as motion, po-tent, &c. ; likewise in the monosyllables, go, so, no. This sound is found under several combinations of other vowels with this letter, as in moan, groan, bow, (to shoot with,) low, (not high,) and before st in the words host, ghost, post, most, and before ss in gross.

163. The second sound of this letter is called its short sound, and is found in not, got, lot, &c. ; though this, as in the other short vowels, is by no means the short sound of the former long one, but corresponds exactly to that of a in what, with which the words not, got, lot, are perfect rhymes. The long sound, to which the o in not and set are short ones, is found under the diphthong au in naught, and the ou in sought ; corresponding exactly to the a in hall, ball, &c. The short sound of this letter, like the short sound of a in father, (78) (79) is frequently, by inaccurate speakers, and chiefly those among the vulgar, lengthened to a middle sound approaching to its long sound, the o in or. This sound is generally heard, as in the case of a, when it is succeeded by two consonants : thus Mr. Smith pronounces broth, froth, and moth, as if written brawth, frawth, and mauth. Of the propriety or impropriety of this, a well-educated ear is the best judge ; but, as was observed under the article A, (79,) if this be not the sound heard among the best speakers, no middle sound ought to be admitted, as good orators will ever incline to definite and absolute sounds, rather than such as may be called non-descripts in language.

164. The third sound of this letter, as was marked in the first observation, may be called its long slender sound, corresponding to the double o. The words where this sound of o occurs are so few, that it will be easy to give a catalogue of them : Prove, more, behave, and their compounds lose, do, ado, Rome, poltroon, pontoon, spontoon, who, whom, womb, lomb. Spontoon is not in Johnson : and this and the two preceding words ought rather to be written with oo in the last syllable. Gold is pronounced like good in familiar conversation ; but in verse and solemn language, especially that of the Scripture, ought always to rhyme with old, fold, &c. See Encore, Gold, and Wind.

165. The fourth sound of this vowel is that which is found in love, dove, &c. ; and the long sound, which seems the nearest relation to it, is the first sound of o in note, tone, rove, &c. This sound of o is generally heard when it is shortened by the succeeding liquids n, m, r, and the semi-vowels v, z, th : and as Mr. Nares has given a catalogue of these words, I shall avail myself of his labour. Above, affront, allonge, among, amongst, attorney, bomb, bombard, borage, borough, brother, cochineal, colour, come, comely, confit, comfort, company, compass, comrade, combat, conduit, cony, conjure, constable, covenant, cover, cweet, civet, covey, cozen, disconfit, done, doth, dost, dove, dozen, dromedary, front, glove, govern, honey, hover, loce, Monday, money, mongrel, monk, monkey, month, mother, none, nothing, one, onion, other, oven, plover, pomegranate, pommel, pother, ronage, shoe, shovel, sloven, smother, some, Somerset, son, sovereign, sponge, stomach, thorough, ton, tongue, word, work, wonder, world, worry, worse, worship, wort, worth : to which we may add, rhomb, once, comfrey, and colander.

166. In these words the accent is on the o in every word, except pomegranate : but with very few exceptions, this letter has the same sound in the unaccented terminations, oc, ock, od, ol, om, on, op, or, ot, and some, as mammock, cassock, method, carol, kingdom, union, amazon, gallot, tator, turbot, troublesome, &c. ; all which are pronounced as if written mammuck, cassuck, methud, &c. The o in the adjunct monger, as cheesemonger, &c. has always this sound. The exceptions to this rule are technical terms from the Greek, or Latin, as Achor, a species of the herpes ; and proper names, as Calor, a river in Italy.

167. The fifth sound of o is the long sound produced by r final, or followed by another consonant, as for, former. This sound is perfectly equivalent to the diphthong au ; and for and former might, on account of sound only, be written faur and faurmer. There are many exceptions to this rule, as borne, corps, corse, force, forge, form (a seat,) forte, horde, porch, port, sport, &c. which have the first sound of this letter.

168. O, like A, is lengthened before r, when terminating a monosyllable, or followed by another consonant ; and, like a too, is shortened by a duplication of the liquid, as we may hear by comparing the conjunction or with the same letters in torrid, florid, &c. ; for though the r is not doubled to the eye in florid, yet, as the accent is on it, it is as effectually doubled to the ear, as if written florrid ; so if a consonant of another kind succeed the r in this situation, we find the o as long as in a monosyllable : thus the o in orchard is as long as in the conjunction or, and that in formal, as in the word for : but in erifice and forage, where the r is followed by a vowel, the o is as short as if the r were double, and the words written erifice and forrage. See No 81.

169. There is a sixth sound of o exactly corresponding to the u in bull, full, pull, &c. which, from its existing only in the following words, may be called its irregular sound. These words are woman, bosom, worsted, wolf, and the proper names, Wolsey, Worcester, and Wolverhampton.

Irregular and Unaccented Sounds.

170. What was observed of the a, when followed by a liquid and a mute, may be observed of the o with equal justness. This letter, like a, has a tendency to lengthen, when followed by a liquid and another consonant, or by s, ss, or s and a mute. But this length of o, in this situation, seems every day growing more and more vulgar : and, as it would be gross to a degree to sound the a in castle, mask, and plant, like the a in palm, psalm, &c. so it would be equally exceptionable to pronounce the o in moss, drass, and frass, as if written mause, drause, and frause. (78) (79.) The o in the compounds of solve as dissolve, absolve, resolve, seem the only words where a somewhat longer sound of the o is agreeable to polite pronunciation : on the contrary, when the o ends a syllable, immediately before or after the accent, as in po-lite, im-po-tent, &c. there is an elegance in giving it the open sound nearly as long as in po-lar and po-tent, &c. See Domestic, Collect, and Command. It may likewise be observed, that the o, like the e, (102) is suppressed in a final unaccented syllable when preceded by c or k, and followed by n, as bacon, beacon, deacon, beckon, reckon, pronounced bak'n, beak'n, deak'n, beck'n, reck'n ; and when c is preceded by another consonant, as falcon, pronounced fawk'n. The o is likewise mute in the same situation, when preceded by d in pardon, pronounced pard'n, but not in guerdon : it is mute when preceded by p in weapon, capon, &c. pronounced weap'n, cap'n, &c. ; and when preceded by s in reason, season, treason, oraison, benison, denison, unison, foison, poison, prison, damson, crimson, advowson, pronounced rea'z'n, treaz'n, &c. ; and mason, bason, garrison, lesson, caparison, comparison, disinherison, parson, and person, pronounced mas'n, bas'n, &c. Unison, diapason, and cargason, seem, particularly in solemn speaking, to preserve the sound of o like u, as if written unusun, diapazun, &c. The same letter is suppressed in a final unaccented syllable beginning with t, as seton, cotton, button, glutton, pronounced as if written set'n, cot'n, &c. When x precedes the t, the o is pronounced distinctly, as in sexton. When l is the preceding letter, the o is generally suppressed, as in the proper names Stilton cheese, Wilton carpets, and Melton Moubray, &c. Accurate speakers sometimes struggle to preserve it in the name of our great epic poet Milton ; but the former examples sufficiently show the tendency of the language ; and this tendency cannot be easily counteracted. This letter is likewise suppressed in the last syllable of blazon, pronounced blaz'n ; but is always to be preserved in the same syllable of horizon. This suppression of the o must not be ranked among those careless abbreviations found only among the vulgar, but must be considered as one of these devious tendencies to brevity, which has worn itself a currency in the language, and has at last become a part of it. To pronounce the o in those cases where it is suppressed, would give a singularity to the speaker bordering nearly on the pedantic ; and the attention given to this singularity by the hearer would necessarily diminish his attention to the subject, and consequently deprive the speaker of something much more desirable.

U.

171. The first sound of u, heard in tube, or ending an accented syllable, as in cu-bick is a diphthongal sound, as if e were prefixed, and these words were spelt teube and kenwick. The letter u is exactly the pronoun you.

172. The second sound of u is the short sound, which tallies exactly with the o in done, son, &c. which every ear perceives, might as well, for the sound's sake, be spelt dun, sun, &c. See all the words where the o has this sound, No. 165.

173. The third sound of this letter, and that in which the English more particularly depart from analogy, is the u in bull, full, pull, &c. The first, or diphthongal u in tube, seems almost as peculiar to the English as the long sound of the i in thine, mine, &c. but here, as if they chose to imitate the Latin, Italian, and French u, they leave out the e before the u, which is heard in tube, mule, &c. and do not pronounce the latter part of u quite so long as the oo in pool, nor so short as the u in dull, but with a middle sound between both, which is the true short sound of the oo in coo and woe, as may be heard by comparing woe and wool; the latter of which is a perfect rhyme to bull.

174. This middle sound of u, so unlike the general sound of that letter, exists only in the following words: bull, full, pull; words compounded of full, as wonderful, dreadful, &c. bullock, bully, bullet, bulwark, fuller, fulling-mill, pulley, pullet, push, bush, bushel, pulpit, puss, bullion, butcher, cushion, cuckoo, pudding, sugar, hussar, huzza, and put when a verb; but few as they are, except full, which is a very copious termination, they are sufficient to puzzle Englishmen who reside at any distance from the capital, and to make the inhabitants of Scotland and Ireland, (who, it is highly probable, received a much more regular pronunciation from our ancestors,) not unfrequently the jest of fools.

175. But vague and desultory as this sound of the u may at first seem, on a closer view we find it chiefly confined to words which begin with the mute labials, b, p, f, and end with the liquid labial l, or the dentals s, t, and d, as in bull, full, pull, bush, push, pudding, puss, put, &c. Whatever, therefore, was the cause of this whimsical deviation, we see its primitives are confined to a very narrow compass: put has this sound only when it is a verb; for putty, a paste for glass, has the common sound of u, and rhymes exactly with nutty, (having the qualities of a nut;) so put, the game at cards, and the vulgar appellation of country put, follow the same analogy. All bull's compounds regularly follow their primitive: as bull-baiting, bull-beggar, bull-dog, &c. But though fuller, a whitenor of cloth, and Fulham, a proper name, are not compounded of full, they are sounded as if they were; while Putney follows the general rule, and has its first syllable pronounced like the noun put. Pulpit and pullet comply with the peculiarity on account of their resemblance to pull, though nothing related to it; and butcher and puss adopt this sound of u for no reason but the nearness of their form to the other words; and when to these we have added cushion, sugar, cuckoo, hussar, and the interjection huzza, we have every word in the whole language where the u is thus pronounced.

176. Some speakers, indeed, have attempted to give bulk and punish, this obtuse sound of u, but luckily have not been followed. The words which have already adopted it are sufficiently numerous; and we cannot be too careful to check the growth of so unmeaning an irregularity. When this vowel is preceded by r, in the same syllable, it has a sound somewhat longer than this middle sound, and exactly as if written oo: thus rué, true, &c. are pronounced nearly as if written roo, troo, &c. (339.)

177. It must be remarked, that this sound of u, except in the word fuller, never extends to words from the learned languages; for fulminant, fulmination, ebullition, repulsion, sepulchre, &c. sound the u as in dull, gull, &c. and the u in puss and pustule, is exactly like the same letter in thus. So the pure English words, fulsome, buss, bulge, bustle, bustard, buzzard, preserve the u in its second sound, as in us, hull, and custard. It may likewise not be unworthy of remark, that the letter u is never subject to the shortening power of either the primary or secondary accent; but when accented, is always long, unless shortened by a double consonant. See the words Drama and Maculent, and No. 503, 334.

Irregular and Unaccented Sounds.

178. But the strangest deviation of this letter from its regular sound is in the words busy, business, and bury.

We laugh at the Scotch for pronouncing these words, as if written benzy, begsiness, and berry; but we ought rather to blush for ourselves in departing so wantonly from the general rule as to pronounce them bizzy, bizness, and berry.

179. There is an incorrect pronunciation of this letter when it ends a syllable not under the accent, which prevails not only among the vulgar, but is sometimes found in better company; and that is, giving the u an obscure sound, which confounds it with vowels of a very different kind; thus we not unfrequently hear singular, regular, and particular, pronounced as if written sing-e-lar, reg-e-lar, and par-tick-e-lar; but nothing tends more to tarnish and vulgarize the pronunciation than this short and obscure sound of the unaccented u. It may, indeed, be observed, that there is scarcely any thing more distinguishes a person of mean and good education than the pronunciation of the unaccented vowels, (547) (553). When vowels are under the accent, the prince, and the lowest of the people in the metropolis, with very few exceptions, pronounce them in the same manner; but the unaccented vowels in the mouth of the former have a distinct, open, and specific sound, while the latter often totally sink them, or change them into some other sound. Those, therefore, who wish to pronounce elegantly, must be particularly attentive to the unaccented vowels; as a neat pronunciation of these forms one of the greatest beauties of speaking.

180. Y final, either in a word or syllable, is a pure vowel, and has exactly the same sound as i would have in the same situation. For this reason, printers, who have been the great correctors of our orthography, have substituted the i in its stead, on account of the too great frequency of this letter in the English language. That y final is a vowel, is universally acknowledged; nor need we any other proof of it than its long sound, when followed by e mute, as in thyme, rhyme, &c. or ending a syllable with the accent upon it, as, buying, cyder, &c.: this may be called its first vowel sound.

181. The second sound of the vowel y is its short sound, heard in system, syntax, &c.

Irregular and Unaccented Sounds.

182. The unaccented sound of this letter at the end of a syllable, like that of i in the same situation, is always like the first sound of e: thus vanity, pleurisy, &c. if sound alone were consulted, might be written vanitee, pleurisee, &c.

183. The exception to this rule is, when f precedes the y in a final syllable, the y is then pronounced as long and open as if the accent were on it: thus justify, qualify, &c. have the last syllable sounded like that in defy. This long sound continues when the y is changed into i, in justifiable, qualifiable, &c. The same may be observed of multiply and multipliable, &c. occupy and occupiable, &c. (512.)

184. There is an irregular sound of this letter when the accent is on it in panegyrick, when it is frequently pronounced like the second sound of e; which would be more correct if its true sound were preserved, and it were to rhyme with Pyrrhick; or as Swift does with Satirick.

"On me when dunces are satirick,

"I take it for a panegyrick."

Thus we see the same irregularity attends this letter before double r, or before single r, followed by a vowel, as we find attends the vowel i in the same situation. So the word Syrinx ought to preserve the y like i pure, and the word syrtis should sound the y like e short, though the first is often heard improperly, like the last.

185. But the most uncertain sound of this letter is, when it ends a syllable immediately preceding the accent. In this case it is subject to the same variety as the letter i in the same situation, and nothing but a catalogue will give us any idea of the analogy of the language in this point.

186. The y is long in chylaceous, but shortened by the secondary accent in chylification and chylificative, (530.) though, without the least reason from analogy, Mr. Sheridan has marked them both long.

187. Words composed of hydro, from the Greek ὕδωρ, water, have the y before the accent generally long, as hydrography, hydrography, hydrometry, hydroprick; all which have the y long in Mr. Sheridan but hydrography, which must be a mistake of the press; and this long sound of y continues in hydrostatick in spite of the shortening power of the secondary accent. (530.) The same sound of y prevails in hydraclicks and hydattides. Hygrometer and hygrometry, seem to follow the same analogy, as well as hyperbola and hyperbole: which are generally heard with the y long; though Kenrick has marked the latter short. Hypostasis and hypotense ought to have the y long likewise. In hypothesis the y is more frequently short than long; and in hypothetical it is more frequently long than short; but hypocrysis has the first y always short. Myrobalan and myropolist may have the y either long or short. Mythology has the first y generally short, and mythological, from the shortening power of the secondary accent, (530.) almost always. Phytotoxic, phytography, phytoLOGY, have the first y always long. In phylactery, the first y is generally short, and in physician always. Phylorus has the y long in Mr. Sheridan, but, I think, improperly. In pyramidal he marks the y long, though, in my opinion, it is generally heard short, as in pyramid. In pyrites, with the accent on the second syllable, he marks the y short, much more correctly than Kenrick, who places the accent on the first syllable, and marks the y long. (See the word.) Synedick, synodical, synonima, and synopsis, have the y always short: synecdoche ought likewise to have the same letter short, as we find it in Perry's and Kenrick's Dictionaries; though in Sheridan's we find it long. Typography and typographer ought to have the first y long, as we find it in Sheridan, Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnston, Kenrick, and Perry, though frequently heard short; and though tyrannical has the y marked short by Mr. Perry, it ought rather to have the long sound, as we see it marked by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnston, and Kenrick.

188. From the view that has been taken of the sound of the i and y immediately before the accent, it may justly be called the most uncertain part of pronunciation. Scarcely any reason can be given why custom prefers one sound to the other in some words; and why, in others, we may use either one or the other indiscriminately. It is strongly to be presumed that the i and y, in this situation, particularly the last, was generally pronounced long by our ancestors, but that custom has gradually inclined to the shorter sound as more readily pronounced, and as more like the sound of these letters when they end a syllable after the accent; and, perhaps, we should contribute to the regularity of the language, if, when we are in doubt, we should rather incline to the short than the long sound of these letters.

189. That w final is a vowel, is not disputed (9); when it is in this situation, it is equivalent to oo, as may be perceived in the sound of cow, tw-el, &c. where it forms a real diphthong, composed of the a in wa-ter, and the oo in woo and coo. It is often joined to o at the end of a syllable, without affecting the sound of that vowel; and in this situation it may be called servile, as in bow to shoot with; crow, low, (not high,) &c.

DIPHTHONGS.

190. A diphthong is a double vowel, or the union or mixture of two vowels pronounced together, so as only to make one syllable: as the Latin a e or e, o e or e, the Greek ai, the English ai, au, &c.

191. This is the general definition of a diphthong: but if we examine it closely, we shall find in it a want of precision and accuracy.* If a diphthong be two vowel sounds in succession, they must necessarily form two syllables, and therefore, by its very definition, cannot be a diphthong: if it be such a mixture of two vowels as to form but one simple sound, it is very improperly called a diphthong; nor can any such simple mixture exist.

192. The only way to reconcile this seeming contradiction, is to suppose that two vocal sounds in succession were sometimes pronounced so closely together as to form only the time of one syllable in Greek and Latin verse. Some of these diphthongal syllables we have in our own language, which only pass for monosyllables in poetry: thus hire (wages) is no more than one syllable in verse, though perfectly equivalent to higher (more high,) which generally passes for a dissyllable: the same may be observed of dire and dyer, hour and power, &c. This is not uniting two vocal sounds into one simple sound, which is impossible; but pronouncing two vocal sounds in succession so rapidly and so closely as to go for only one syllable in poetry.

193. Thus the best definition I have found of a diphthong is that given us by Mr. Smith, in his Scheme for a French and English Dictionary. "A diphthong (says this gentleman) I would define to be two simple vocal sounds uttered by one and the same emission of breath, and joined in such a manner that each loses a portion of its natural length; but from the junction produceth a compound sound, equal in the time of pronouncing to either of them taken separately, and so making still but one syllable."

194. "Now if we apply this definition (says Mr. Smith) to the several combinations that may have been laid down and denominated diphthongs by former orthoepists, I believe we shall find only a small number of them meriting this name." As a proof of the truth of this observation, we find, that most of those vocal assemblages that go under the name of diphthongs emit but a simple sound, and that not compounded of the two vowels, but one of them only, sounded long: thus pain and paine, pail and pale, hear and here, are perfectly the same sounds.

195. These observations naturally lead us to a distinction of diphthongs into proper and improper; the proper are such as have two distinct vocal sounds, and the improper such as have but one.

196. The proper diphthongs are,

|-------------------|--------------------|----------------------|
| ea ocean | io question | oy boy |
| eu feud | oi voice | ua assuage |
| ew jewel | ou pound | ue mansuetude |
| i poniard | oo now | ui languid |
| ie spaniel | | |

In this assemblage it is impossible not to see a manifest distinction between those which begin with e or i, and the rest. In those beginning with either of these vowels we find a squeezed sound like the commencing or consonant y interpose, as it were, to articulate the latter vowel, and that the words where these diphthongs are found, might, agreeably to the sound, be spelt oshe-yen, f-yude, 7-yewel, pon-yard, span-yel, push-yon, &c.; and as these diphthongs (which, from their commencing with the sound of y consonant, may not improperly be called semi-consonant diphthongs,) begin in that part of the mouth where s, c soft, and t are formed, we find that coalescence ensue which forms the aspirated hiss in the numerous termination sion, tion, tial, &c. and by direct consequence in those ending in ure, une, as future, fortune, &c. for the letter u, when long, is exactly one of these semi-consonant diphthongs (8;) and coming immediately after the accent it coalesces with the preceding s, c, or t, and draws it into the aspirated hiss of sh or tsh. (459.) Those found in the termination iou may be called semi-consonant diphthongs also, as the o and u have but the sound of one vowel. It may be observed too, in passing, that the reason why in mansuetude the s does not go into sh, is, because when u is followed by another vowel in the same syllable, it drops its consonant sound at the beginning, and becomes merely double o.

197. The improper diphthongs are,

|------------------|-------------------|-------------------|
| ae Caesar | ea clean | ie friend |
| ai aim | ee reed | oa coat |
| ao gaol | ei ceiling | oe economy |
| au taught | eo people | oo moon |
| aw law | ey they | ow crow |

198. The triphthongs having but two sounds are merely ocular, and must therefore be classed with the proper diphthongs:

|-----------------------|---------------------|----------------------|
| aye (for ever) | eu plenteous | iew view |
| eau beauty | ieu adieu | ocu manoeuvre |

Of all these combinations of vowels we shall treat in their alphabetical order.

AE.

199. Ae or e is a diphthong, says Dr. Johnson, of very frequent use in the Latin language, which seems not properly to have any place in the English; since the e of the Saxons has been long out of use, being changed to e simple; to which, in words frequently occurring, the e of the Romans is, in the same manner, altered, as in equator, equinoctial, and even in Eneas.

200. But though the diphthong e is perfectly useless in our language, and the substitution of e in its stead, in Cesar and Eneas, is recommended by Dr. Johnson, we do not find his authority has totally annihilated it, especially in proper names and technical terms derived from the learned languages. Cesar, Eneas, Æsop, pæan, æther, æthiops mineral, amphisbæna, anæcephalæosis, aphæresis, ægiplos, œzæna, &c. seem to preserve the diphthong, as well as certain words, which are either plurals or genitives in Latin words not naturalized, as cornucopia, exuvie, aqua vite, minutie, stria, &c.

201. This diphthong, when not under the accent, in Michaelmas, and when accented in Dædalus, is pronounced like short e; it is, like e, subject to the short sound when under the secondary accent, as in Ænobarbus, where æn, in the first syllable, is pronounced exactly like the letter n. (530.)

AI.

202. The sound of this diphthong is exactly like the long slender sound of a; thus pail, a vessel, and pale, a colour, are perfectly the same sound. The exceptions are but few.

203. When said is the third person preterimperfect tense of the verb to say, ai has the sound of short e, and said rhymes with bed; the same sound of ai may be observed in the third person of the present tense *sait*h and the participle said; it is regular, and rhymes with trade.

204. Plaïd, a striped garment, rhymes with mad.

205. Railleur is a perfect rhyme to salary; and raisin, a fruit, is pronounced exactly like reason, the distinctive faculty of man. See both these words in the Dictionary.

206. Again and Against, sound as if written agen and agenst.

207. The aisle of a church is pronounced exactly like isle, an island; and is sometimes written ile.

208. When this diphthong is in a final unaccented syllable, the a is sunk and the i pronounced short: thus mountain, fountain, captain, curtain, villain, are all pronounced as if written mountin, fountin, captin, curtin, villin: but when the last word takes an additional syllable, the i is dropped, and the a has its short sound, as villanous, villany. See the words in the Dictionary.

209. The ai in Britain has the short sound approaching to u, so common with all the vowels in final unaccented syllables, and is pronounced exactly like Briton.

* We see how many disputes the simple and ambiguous nature of vowels created among grammarians, and how it has begot the mistake concerning diphthongs: all that are properly so are syllables, and not diphthongs, as intended to be signified by that word. Holder.

210. Plait, a fold of cloth, is regular, and ought to be pronounced like plate, a dish; pronouncing it so as to rhyme with meat is a vulgarism, and ought to be avoided.

211. Plaster belongs no longer to this class of words, being now more properly written plaster, rhyming with caster.

AO.

212. This combination of vowels in a diphthong is only to be met with in the word gaol, now more properly written pen, as it is pronounced, jail.

AU.

213. The general sound of this diphthong is that of the noun awe, as taught, caught, &c. or of the a in hall, ball, &c.

214. When these letters are followed by n, and another consonant, they change to the second sound of a heard in far, farther, &c.: thus awnt, ausance, haunch, launch, askaunt, flaunt, hawnt, gauntlet, jaunt, craunch, jaundice, lawndress, laundry, have the Italian sound of the a in the last syllable of papa and nanna. To these I think ought to be added, daunt, paunch, gaunt, and saunter, as Dr. Kenrick has marked them with the Italian a, and not as if written dawnt, paunch, &c. as Mr. Sheridan sounds them. Mawnd, a basket, is always pronounced with the Italian a, and nearly as if written maund; for which reason Mawndy Thursday, which is derived from it, ought, with Mr. Nares, to be pronounced in the same manner, though generally heard with the sound of av. To maunder, to grumble, though generally heard as if written maunder, ought certainly to be pronounced as Mr. Nares has classed it, with the Italian a. The same may be observed of taunt, which ought to rhyme with awnt, though sounded taunt by Mr. Sheridan; and being left out of the above list, supposed to be so pronounced by Mr. Nares. [But Mr. Elphinstone has placed the analogy of these words in so strong and curious a light, that I cannot help presenting them to the reader in his own words, though a different orthography: "U meritoriously distinguishes awnt, the parent's sister, from ant the emmet, and gives a slender shut, the servile of a broad open; yet without pretence of so dangerous or any coincidence; in defiance of both sisters, his awnt had power to retain the company of jaunt, hawnt, gaunt, taunt, dawnt, gaunt, gauntlet; in all of which the u does precisely the same duty as formerly did in chaunt, graunt, maund, and command; in saunter and saunder; as well as in branch, haunch; paunch, launch, staunch; all now justly as genealogically, chant, granch, mand, (the old basket), command, saunter, sander; branch, hanch, panch, lanch, stanch. Jaundice alone pleaded u as also radical; and yet was found mere jandice. So with awnt, must return to truth and etymology (who do not awnt must join issue,) jant, hant, vant, tant, dant, gant, gantlet; and even the venerable Mandy Thursday, with her mand or basket in her hand. She had, indeed, almost left the language, though Astrea had not left the habit, when analogy (or harmony) enacted; a broad (aw) shall not in English precede u; followed either by a dry at, or by a sibilant; that is, au shall not be followed by nt, nd, ne, nch, or nge. No such sounds being sufferable in the English system, as awnt, awnd, awuch, awuce, or awuge; there shall be no such semblances. Alike are therefore indispensable, chant and jant; hand and mand, chance and lance, branch and lanch, banter and santer; Sande and his full self Alexander. In all such, a far from broad or open, is slender and shut; yet hardly shorter than if the silent aspiration interposed in sahter, lahnce, lahnce, and the rest. Before nge, indeed, a is also slender, but open; not ah, but e; guarded therefore by its own (i) servile (as we saw in its place) against every danger of change. Fawn and faun remain doubtless in fauns and fawns, unaltered by the seditions depressive sibilant." Properly ascertained in her Picture, vol. i. p. 171.]

215. Laugh and draught, which are very properly classed by Mr. Nares among those words which have the long Italian a in father, are marked by Mr. Sheridan with the first sound of a in had, lengthened into the sound of a in father, by placing the accent on it. Staunch is spelled without the a by Johnson, and therefore improperly classed by Mr. Nares in the above list.

216. Faunt and avaunt seem to be the only real exceptions to this sound of a in the whole list; and as these words are chiefly confined to tragedy, they may be allowed to "fret and strut their hour upon the stage" in the old traditional sound of awe.

217. This diphthong is pronounced like long o in haughty, as if written ho-boy; and like o short in auliflower, laxrel, and laudatum; as if written colliflower, lorrel, and loddatum. In gauche, au has the sound of slender a, and rhymes with page.

218. There is a corrupt pronunciation of this diphthong among the vulgar, which is, giving the au in daughter, sauce, saucer, and saucy, the sound of the Italian a, and nearly as if written darter, sarce, sarcer, and sarcy; but this pronunciation cannot be too carefully avoided. Au in sausage, also, is sounded by the vulgar with short a, as if written sassage; but in this, as in the other words, au ought to sound awce. See the words in the Dictionary.

AW.

219. Has the long broad sound of a in ball, with which the word bawl is perfectly identical. It is always regular.

AY.

220. This diphthong, like its near relation ai, has the sound of slender a in pay, day, &c. and is pronounced like long e in the word quay, which is now sometimes seen written key; for if we cannot bring the pronunciation to the spelling, it is looked upon as some improvement to bring the spelling to the pronunciation: a most pernicious practice in the language. See Bowl.

221. To flay, to strip off the skin, also, is corruptly pronounced flea; but the diphthong in this word seems to be recovering its rights.

222. There is a wanton departure from analogy in orthography, by changing the y in this diphthong to i in the words paid, said, laid, for payed, sayed, and layed. Why these words should be written with i, and thus contracted, and played, prayed, and delayed, remain at large, let our wise correctors of orthography determine. Stayed also, a participial adjective signifying steady, is almost always written staid.

223. When ay comes immediately after the accent in a final syllable, like ai, it drops the former vowel in the colloquial pronunciation of the days of the week. Thus, as we pronounce captain, curtain, &c. as if written captin, curtin, &c. so we hear Sunday, Monday, &c. as if written Sundy, Mundy, &c. A more distinct pronunciation of day in these words, is a mark of the northern dialect. (208.)

224. The familiar assent of ay for yes, is a combination of the long Italian a in the last syllable of papa, and the first sound of e. If we give the a the sound of that letter in ball, the word degenerates into a coarse rustic pronunciation: though, in the House of Commons, where this word is made a noun, we frequently, but not correctly, hear it so pronounced, in the phrase the Ayes have it.

AYE.

225. This triphthong is a combination of the slender sound of a, heard in pa-per, and the e in me-tre. The word which it composes, signifying ever, is almost obsolete.

E.A.

226. The regular sound of this diphthong is that of the first sound of e in here; but its irregular sound of short e is so frequent, as to make a catalogue of both necessary; especially for those who are unsettled in the pronunciation of the capital, and wish to practise in order to form a habit.

227. The first sound of ea is like open e, and is heard in the following words: Afsard, affer, anneal, appeal, appear, appease, aread, arrear, beacon, beadie, beadroll, beads, badsmen, beagle, beak, beaker, beam, bean, beard, bearded, beast, beat, beaten, beaver, beaueguer, beneath, bequeath, bereave, besmeer, bespeak, bleach, bleak, blear, bleat, blea, breach, bream, to breathe, cease, cheap, cheat, clean, clea, cleanly, (adverb.) clear, clearance, cleave, cochineal, colleague, conceal, congeal, cream, creak, crease, creature, deacon, deal, dean, deanery, dear, decease, defeasance, defeasible, defeat, demean, demeanour, decrease, dream, dream, dreary, each, eager, eagle, eagre, ear, east, eastern, easy, to eat, eaten, eaves, entreat, encore, escheat, feast, fearful, feasible, feasibility, feast, feat, feature, feet, feam, freak, gear, gleam, glean, to grease, grease, greaves, heap, heap, heat, heath, heather, heave, impeach, increase, insane, interleave, knead, lead, to lead, leaf, league, leak, lean, leaze, leash, leasing, leat, leaves, leaves, mead, meagre, meal, mean, meat, measles, meathe, neat, neap, near, pea, peace, peak, peat, pease, peat, plead, please, reach, to read, ream, reap, rear, rearnard, reason, recheat, redstrack, release, repal, repeat, retreat, reveal, scream, scream, seal, seam, seamy, sear, sear, cloth, season, seat, shear, shears, sheath, shicthe, sheaf, steasy, sneak, sneaker, sneakup, spcak, spcar, steal, steak, stream, streamer, streamy, surcease, tea, teach, tead, teague, teal, team, tear, (substantive,) teave, teat, treacle, treason, treat, treatise, treatment, treaty.

twag, twack, twaguc, veal, underneath, uneasy, unreach, uprear, weak, weaken, weal, wean, weanling, weaniness, wearisome, weary, weasand, weasel, weave, wheat, wheaten, wreak, wreath, wreath, wreathy, yea, year, yearling, yearling, yearly, zeal.

228. In this catalogue we find heard and bearded sometimes pronounced as if written berd and berded: but this corruption of the diphthong which Mr. Sheridan has adopted, seems confined to the Stage. See the word.

229. The preterimperfect tense of eat is sometimes written ate, particularly by Lord Bolingbroke, and frequently, and, perhaps, more correctly, pronounced et, especially in Ireland: but eaten always preserves the ea long.

230. Ea in fearful is long when it signifies timorous, and short when it signifies terrible, as if written ferful. See the word.

231. To read is long in the present tense, and short in the past and participle, which are sometimes written red.

232. Teat, a dug, is marked by Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Elphinston, and Mr. Nares, with short e like it, but more properly by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, and Mr. Smith, with the long e, rhyming with meat.

233. Beat, the preterimperfect tense, and participle of beat, is frequently pronounced in Ireland like bet (a wager): and if utility were the only object of language, this would certainly be the preferable pronunciation, as nothing tends more to obscurity than verbs which have no different form for their present and past times; but fashion in this, as in many other cases, triumphs over use and propriety; and bet, for the past time and participle of beat, must be religiously avoided.

234. Ea is pronounced like the short e in the following words: Abreast, ahead, already, bedstead, behead, bespread, bestead, bread, breadth, breakfast, breast, breath, cleanse, cleanly, (adjective), cleanly, dead, deadly, deaf, deafen, dearth, death, earl, earldom, early, earn, earnest, earth, earthen, earthly, endeavour, feather, head, heady, health, heard, hearse, heaven, heavy, jealous, imperial, instead, lead, leaden, leant, (the past time and participle of to lean), learn, learning, leather, leaven, meadow, meat, measure, pearl, peasant, pheasant, pleasant, pleasantly, pleasure, read, (past time and participle), readily, readiness, ready, realm, rehearsal, rehearse, research, seamstress, scarce, search, spread, stead, steadfast, steady, stealth, stealthy, sweat, sweaty, thread, threaten, threat, threaten, treachery, tread, treadle, treasure, uncleanly, wealth, wealthy, weapon, weather, years, zealot, zealous, zealously.

235. I have given the last three words, compounded of zeal, as instances of the short sound of the diphthong, because it is certainly the more usual sound; but some attempts have lately been made in the House of Commons to pronounce them long, as in the noun. It is a commendable zeal to endeavour to reform the language as well as the constitution; but whether, if these words were altered, it would be a real reformation, may admit of some dispute. See Encyclical Termination, No. 515, and the word Zealot.

236. Heard, the past time and participle of hear, is sometimes corruptly pronounced with the diphthong long, so as to rhyme with rear'd; but this is supposing the verb to be regular; which, from the spelling, is evidently not the case.

237. It is, perhaps, worth observation, that when this diphthong comes before r, it is apt to slide into the short u, which is undoubtedly very near the true sound, but not exactly: thus pronouncing earl, earth, dearth, as if written url, urth, durth, is a slight deviation from the true sound, which is exactly that of i before r, followed by another consonant, in virtue, virgin; and that is the true sound of short e in vermin, vernal, &c. (108.)

238. Leant, the past time and participle of to lean, is grown vulgar: the regular form leaned is preferable.

239. The past time and participle of the verb to leap, seems to prefer the irregular form: therefore, though we almost always hear to leap rhyming with reap, we generally hear leaped, written and pronounced leapt, rhyming with wept.

240. Ea is pronounced like long slender a in bare, in the following words: Bear, bearer, break, forbear, forswear, great, pear, steak, swear, to tear, wear.

241. The word great is sometimes pronounced as if written greet, generally by people of education, and almost universally in Ireland; but this is contrary to the fixed and settled practice in England. That this is an affected pronunciation, will be perceived in a moment by pronouncing this word in the phrase, Alexander the Great; for those who pronounce the word greet, in other cases, will generally in this rhyme it with fata. It is true the ee is the regular sound of this diphthong; but this slender sound of e has, in all probability, given way to that of a as deeper and more expressive of the epithet great.

242. The same observations are applicable to the word break; which is much more expressive of the action when pronounced brake than breek, as it is sometimes affectedly pronounced.

243. Ea is pronounced like the long Italian a in father, in the following words: Heart, hearty, hearten, hearth, hearken.

244. Ea, unaccented, has an obscure sound, approaching to short u, in vengeance, serjeant, pageant, and paeantry.

EAU.

245. This is a French rather than an English triphthong, being found only in words derived from that language. Its sound is that of long open o, as beau, bureau, flambeau, portmanteau. In beauty and its compounds, it has the first sound of u, as if written bewty.

EE.

246. This diphthong, in all words except those that end in r, has a squeezed sound of long open e, formed by a closer application of the tongue to the roof of the mouth, than in that vowel singly, which is distinguishable to a nice ear, in the different sounds of the verbs to flee and to meet, and the nouns flea and meat. This has always been my opinion; but, upon consulting some good speakers on the occasion, and in particular, Mr. Garrick, who could find no difference in the sound of these words, I am less confident in giving it to the publick. At any rate the difference is but very trifling, and I shall therefore consider ee as equivalent to the long open e.

247. This diphthong is irregular only in the word breeches, pronounced as if written britches. Cheesecake, sometimes pronounced chizcake, and breech, britch, I look upon as vulgarisms. Beelzebub, indeed, in prose, has generally the short sound of e, as in bell: and when these two letters form but one syllable, in the poetical contraction of e'er and ne'er, for ever and never, they are pronounced as if written air and nair.

EI.

248. The general sound of this diphthong seems to be the same as ey, when under the accent, which is like long slender a; but the other sounds are so numerous as to require a catalogue of them all.

249. Ei has the sound of long slender a in deign, vein, reign, reign, feign, feint, veil, heinous, heir, heiress, inveigh, weigh, neigh, skein, reins, their, theirs, eight, freight, weight, neighbour, and their compounds. When gh comes after this diphthong, though there is not the least remnant of the Saxon guttural sound, yet it has not exactly the same simple vowel sound as when followed by other consonants; ei, followed by gh, sounds both vowels like ae; or if we could interpose the y consonant between the a and t in eight, weight, &c. it might, perhaps, convey the sound better. The difference, however, is so delicate as to render this distinction of no great importance. The same observations are applicable to the words straight, straighten, &c. See the word Eight.

250. Ei has the sound of long open e in here, in the following words and their compounds: To ceil, ceiling, conceit, deceit, receipt, conceive, perceive, deceive, receive, inveigle, seize, seisin, seignior, seignior, seine, plebeian. Obedience ought to be in the preceding class. See the word.

251. Leisure is sometimes pronounced as rhyming with pleasure; but, in my opinion, very improperly: for if i be allowed that custom is equally divided, we ought, in this case, to pronounce the diphthong long, as more expressive of the idea annexed to it. (241.)

252. Either and neither are so often pronounced eyther and nighther, that it is hard to say to which class they belong. Analogy, however, without hesitation, gives the diphthong the sound of long open e, rather than that of i, and rhymes them with breather, one who breathes. This is the pronunciation Mr. Garrick always gave to these words; but the true analogical sound of the diphthong in these words is that of the slender a, as if written ayther and nayther. This pronunciation is adopted in Ireland, but is not favoured by one of our orthoepists; for Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Perry, Mr. Smith, Steel's Grammar, and Dr. Jones, all pronounce these words with the diphthong like long e. W. Johnston alone adopts the sound of long i exclusively; Dr. Kenrick gives both eyther and ither, but prefers the first, but gives neither the sound of long e exclusively: Mr. Coote says these words are generally pronounced with the i like the i in mine. Mr. Barclay gives no description of the sound of ei in either, but says neither is sometimes pronounced nither and by others neither; and Mr. Nares says, "either and neither are spoken by some with the sound of long i; I have heard even that of long a given to them: but as the regular way is also in use, I think it is preferable. These differences seem to have arisen from ignorance of the regular sound of ei." If by the regular way and the regular sound of this dipththong Mr. Nares means the long sound of e, we need only inspect No. 249, and 250, to see that the sound of a is the more general sound, and therefore ought to be called the regular; but where there are so many instances of words where this dipththong has the long sound of e, and custom is so uniform in these words, there can be no doubt which is the true sound.

253. Ei has the sound of long open i, in height and sleight, rhyming with white and right. Height is, indeed, often heard rhyming with eight and weight, and that among very respectable speakers; but custom seems to decide in favour of the other pronunciation, that it may better tally with the adjective high, of which it is the abstract.

254. Ei has the sound of short e, in the two words heifer and nonpareil, pronounced heffer and nonparell.

255. This dipththong, when unaccented, like ai, (208,) drops the former vowel, and is pronounced like short i, in foreign, foreigner, forfeit, forfeiture, sovereign, sovereignty, surfeit, counterfeit.

EO.

256. This dipththong is pronounced like e long in people, as if written *peep*le; and like e short in leopard, and jeopardy, as if written leppard and jeppardy; and in the law terms feoffee, jeoffee, and feoffment, as if written feffee, feffer, and feffment.

257. We frequently hear these vowels contracted into short o in geography and geometry, as if written joggraphy, and jommerty; but this gross pronunciation seems daily wearing away, and giving place to that which separates the vowels into two distinct syllables, as it is always heard in geographical, geometer, geometrical, and geometrician. Georgick is always heard as if written jorgick, and must be given up as incorrigible. (116.)

258. Eo is heard like long u in feud, feodal, feodatory, which are sometimes written as they are pronounced feud, feudal, feudatory.

259. Eo, when unaccented, has the sound of u short in surgeon, sturgeon, dudgeon, gudgeon, bludgeon, curmudgeon, dungeon, luncheon, punchoon, truncheon, burgeon, habergeon, but in scutcheon, escutcheon, pigeon, and widgeon, the eo sounds like short i.

260. Eo sounds like long u in yeoman and yeomanry; the first syllables of which words rhyme with go, no, &c. See the words.

261. Eo in galloon, a Spanish ship, sounds as if written gallooon, rhyming with moon.

EOU.

262. This assemblage of vowels, for they cannot be properly called a triphthong, is often contracted into one syllable in prose, and poets never make it go for two. In cutaneous and vitreous, two syllables are palpable; but in gorgeous and outrageous the soft g coalescing with e seems to drop a syllable, though polite pronunciation will always preserve it.

263. This assemblage is never found but in an unaccented syllable, and generally a final one; and when it is immediately preceded by the dentals d or t, it melts them into the sounds of j and ch: thus hideoous and piteous are pronounced as if written hijeous and pitcheous. The same may be observed of righteous, plenteous, bounteous, counteous, beauteous, and duteous. (293,) (294.)

EU.

264. This dipththong is always sounded like long u or ew, and is scarcely ever irregular: thus feud, deuce, &c. are pronounced as if written feud, deuce, &c.

EW.

265. This dipththong is pronounced like long u, and is almost always regular. There is a corrupt pronunciation of it like oo chiefly in London, where we sometimes hear deu and new, pronounced as if written doo and noo; but when r precedes this dipththong, as in brew, crew, drew, &c. pronouncing it like oo, is scarcely improper. See (176,) (339.)

266. Shew and strew have almost left this class, and by Johnson's recommendation are become show and straw, as they are pronounced. The proper name Shrewsbury, however, still retains the e, though always pronounced Shröwsbury. Sew, with a needle, always rhymes with no; and sewer, signifying a drain, is generally pronounced shore: but sewer an officer, rhymes with fewer. See Sewer.

267. Ew is sometimes pronounced like aw in the verb to chew; but this is gross and vulgar. To chew ought always to rhyme with new, view, &c.

EWE.

268. This triphthong exists only in the word ewe, a female sheep; which is pronounced exactly like yew a tree, or the plural personal pronoun you. There is a vulgar pronunciation of this word as if written yoe, rhyming with doe, which must be carefully avoided. See the word.

EY.

269. When the accent is on this dipththong, it is always pronounced like ay, or like its kindred dipththong ei in vein, reign, &c.; thus bey, dey, grey, prey, they, treys, wey, obey, convey, purvey, survey, hey, eyre, and eyry, are always heard as if written bay, day, &c. Key and ley are the only exceptions, which always rhyme with sea. (220.)

270. Ey, when unaccented, is pronounced like ee: thus galley, valley, alley, barley, &c. are pronounced as if written gallee, vallee, &c. The noun survey, therefore, if we place the accent on the first syllable, is anomalous. See the word.

EYE.

271. This triphthong is only found in the word eye, which is always pronounced like the letter I.

IA.

272. This dipththong, in the terminations ian, ial, iard, and iate, forms but one syllable, though the i in this situation, having the squeezed sound of ee perfectly similar to y, gives the syllable a double sound, very distinguishable in its nature from a syllable formed without the i: thus Christian, filial, poniard, conciliate, sound as if written Christ-yan, fil-yal, pon-yard, conci-yate, and have in the last syllable an evident mixture of the sound of y consonant. (113.)

273. In diamond, these vowels are properly no dipththong; and in prose, the word ought to have three distinct syllables; but we frequently hear it so pronounced as to drop the a entirely, and as if written dimond. This, however, is a corruption that ought to be avoided.

274. In carriage, marriage, parliament, and miniature, the a is dropped, and the i has its short sound, as if written carridge, marridge, parliment, miniture. (90.)

IE.

275. The regular sound of this dipththong is that of ee, as in grieve, thieve, fiend, liefe, liege, chief, kerchief, handkerchief, auctioneer, grenadier, &c. as if written greeve, theeve, feend, &c.

276. It has the sound of long i in die, hie, lie, pie, tie, vie, as if written dy, hy, &c.

277. The short sound of e is heard in friend, tierce, and the long sound of the same letter in tier, frieze.

278. In variegate the best pronunciation is to sound both vowels distinctly like e, as if written va-ry-e-gate.

279. In the numeral terminations in ieth, as twentieth, thirtieth, &c. the vowels ought also to be kept distinct; the first like open e, as heard in the y in twenty, thirty, &c. and the second like short e, heard in breath, death, &c.

280. In fiery too, the vowels are heard distinctly.

281. In orient and spaniel, where these letters come after a liquid, they are pronounced distinctly; and great care should be taken not to let the last word degenerate into spannel. (113.)

282. When these letters meet, in consequence of forming the plurals of nouns, they retain either the long or short sound they had in the singular, without increasing the number of syllables: thus a fly makes flies, a tie makes lies, company makes companies, and dignity dignities. The same may be observed of the third persons and past participles of verbs, as I fly, he flies, I deny, he denies, he denied, I sully, he sullied, &c. which may be pronounced as if written denize, denide, sullid, &c. (104.)

283. When ie is a termination without the accent, it is pronounced like e only, in the same situation: thus brasier, grazier, and glazier, have the last syllable sounded as if written brazhur, grazhur, and glazhur, or rather as braze-yur, graze-yur, &c. (98,) (418.)

IEU.

284. These vowels occur in adieu, lieu, pur-lieu, where they have the sound of long u, as if written adeu, leu, pur-leu.

285. In one word, lieutenant, these letters are pronounced like short e, as if written lev-tenant. See the word.

IEW.

286. These letters occur only in the word view where they sound like eeu, rhyming with few new.

IO.

287. When the accent is upon the first of these vowels they form two distinct syllables, as violent, violet; the last of which is sometimes corruptly pronounced vi-let.

288. In marchioness the i is entirely sunk, and the unaccented o pronounced, as it usually is in this situation, like short u, as if written marshuness. (352.)

289. In cushion the o is sunk, and the word pronounced cushin. See the word.

290. In the very numerous termination ion, these vowels are pronounced in one syllable like short u; but when they are preceded by a liquid, as in million, minion, clarion, &c. (113), the two vowels, though they make but one syllable, are heard distinctly: the same may be observed when they are preceded by any of the other consonants, except s and t, as champion, scorpion, &c. where the vowels are heard separately: but the terminations tion and sion are pronounced in one syllable, like the verb shun.

291. The only exception to this rule is, when the i is preceded by s: in this case the t goes into tch, and the i is in a small degree audible like short e. This may be heard in question, mixture, digestion, combustion, and what is an instance of the same kind in Christian, as if written ques-tshun, miz-tshun, &c. quest-yun, mizt-yun. (372.) (464.)

IOU.

292. This triphthong, when preceded by a liquid, or any mute but a dental, is heard distinctly in two syllables, as in bilious, various, glorious, abstemious, ingenious, copious; but when preceded by the dentals t, soft c and s, these vowels coalesce into one syllable, pronounced like shus: thus precious, factions, noxious, anxious, are sounded as if written pres-shus, fac-shus, nock-shus, ang-shus. (459.)

293. The same tendency of these vowels to coalesce after a dental, and draw it to aspiration, makes us hear tedious, odious, and insidious, pronounced as if written te-je-us, o-je-us, and in-sid-je-us; for as d is but flat t, it is no wonder it should be subject to the same aspiration, when the same vowels follow: nay, it may be affirmed, that so agreeable is this sound of the d to the analogy of English pronunciation, that, unless we are upon our guard, the organs naturally slide into it. It is not, however, pretended that this is the politest pronunciation; for the sake of analogy it were to be wished it were: but an ignorance of the real powers of the letters, joined with a laudable desire of keeping as near as possible to the orthography, is apt to prevent the d from going into j, and to make us hear o-de-us, te-de-us, &c. On the other hand, the vulgar, who in this case are right by instinct, not only indulge the aspiration of the d, which the language is so prone to, but are apt to unite the succeeding syllables too closely, and to say o-jus, and te-jus, instead of o-je-us, and te-je-us, or rather ode-yus, tede-yus.

294. If the y be distinctly pronounced, it sufficiently expresses the aspiration of the d, and is, in my opinion, the preferable mode of delineating the sound, as it keeps the two last syllables from uniting too closely. Where analogy, therefore, is so clear, and custom so dubious, we ought not to hesitate a moment at pronouncing odious, tedious, perfidious, fastidious, insidious, invidious, compedious, melodious, commodious, preludious, and studious, as if written, o-je-ous, te-je-ous, &c. or rather ode-yus, tede-yus, &c. nor should we forget that Indian comes under the same analogy, and ought, though contrary to respectable usage, to be pronounced as if written Indyan, and nearly as In-je-an. (376.)

O.A.

295. This dipthong is regularly pronounced as the long open sound of o, as in boat, coat, oat, coal, loaf, &c. The only exceptions are, broad, abroad, groat, which sound as if written bravd, abravd, gravt. Oatmeal is sometimes pronounced ot-meal, but seems to be recovering the long sound of o, as in oat.

OE.

296. Whether it be proper to retain the o in this dipthong, or to banish it from our orthography, as Dr. Johnson advises certain it is, that in words from the learned languages it is always pronounced like single e, and comes entirely under the same laws as that vowel; thus, when it ends a syllable, with the accent upon it, it is long, as in An-toe-ci, Peri-oe-ci: when under the secondary accent, in oec-umenical, oec-onomicks, it is like e short: it is long e in foe-tus, and short e in foe-tid and assa-foetida; in doe, foe, sloe, toe, throe, hoe, (to dig,) and bilboes, it is sounded exactly like long open o: in canoe and shoe, like oo, as if written canoo and shoo: and in the verb does, like short u, as if written duz.

OEI.

297. There is but one word where this triphthong occurs, and that is in Shakspeare's King Lear, in the word oeliads, (glances,) and, in my opinion, it ought to be sounded as if written e-il-yads.

OEU.

298. This dipthong is from the French, in the word manoeuvre; a word, within these few years, of very general use in our language. It is not in Johnson, and the oeu is generally pronounced by those who can pronounce French in the French manner; but this is such a sound of the u as does not exist in English, and therefore it cannot be described. The nearest sound is oo: with which, if this word is pronounced by an English speaker, as if written manoeuvre, it may, except with very nice French ears, escape criticism.

OI.

299. The general and almost universal sound of this dipthong, is that of a in water, and the first e in me-tre. This double sound is very distinguishable in boil, tail, spoil, joint, point, anoint, &c. which sound ought to be carefully preserved, as there is a very prevalent practice among the vulgar of dropping the o, and pronouncing these words as if written bile, tile, spile, &c.

300. The only instance which admits of a doubt in the sound of this dipthong, when under the accent, is in the word choir; but this word is now so much more frequently written quire, that uniformity strongly inclines us to pronounce the oi in choir like long i, and which, by the common orthography, seems fixed beyond recovery. But it may be observed, that either the spelling or the pronunciation of Chorister, commonly pronounced Quirister, ought to be altered. See the words.

301. When this dipthong is not under the accent, it is variously pronounced. Dr. Kenrick places the accent on the first syllable of turcois, and, for I know not what reason, pronounces it as if written turkiz; and turkois with the oi broad, as in boys. Mr. Sheridan places the accent on the second syllable, and gives the dipthong the French sound, as if the word was written turkaze. In my opinion the best orthography is turquoise, and the best pronunciation with the accent on the last syllable, and the oi sounded like long e, as if written turkees; as we pronounce tortoise, with the accent on the first syllable, and the oi like short i, as if written tortiz.

302. In avoids, the first dipthong is pronounced like short e, as if written averdupoise.

303. In connoisseur the same sound of e is substituted, as if written conneisseur.

304. In shamois or chamois, a species of leather, the oi is pronounced like long e, as if written shammee.

305. Adroit and devoir, two scarcely naturalized French words, have the oi regular, though the latter word, in polite pronunciation, retains its French sound, as if written deewor.

OO.

306. The sound of this dipthong is regular, except in a few words: it is pronounced long in moon, soon, fool, rood, food, mood, &c. This is its regular sound.

307. It has a shorter sound corresponding to the u in bull, in the words wool, wood, good, hood, fool, stood, understood, withstood; and these are the only words where this dipthong has this middle sound.

308. It has the sound of short u in the two words blood and floor, rhyming with mud.

309. Soot is vulgarly pronounced so as to rhyme with but, hut, &c. but ought to have its long, regular sound, rhyming with boot, as we always hear it in the compound sooty. See the word.

310. Door and floor are universally pronounced by the English, as if written dore and flöre; but in Ireland they preserve the regular sound of oo. See the word Door.

311. Moore, a black man, is regular in polite pronunciation, and like more in vulgar. Moore, a marsh, is sometimes heard rhyming with store; but more correct speakers pronounce it regularly, rhyming with poor.

OU.

312. This is the most irregular assemblage of vowels in our language: its most common sound is that heard in bound, found, ground, &c. and this may be called its proper sound; but its deviations are so many and so various, that the best idea of it will be conveyed by giving the simples of all its different sounds.

313. The first or proper sound of this diphthong is composed of the u in ball, and the o in woo, or rather the u in bull, and is equivalent to the ou in down, frown, &c. This sound is heard in abound, about, account, acousticks, aground, aloud, amount, around, arouse, astound, avouch, bough, bounce, bound, bounty, bounteous, bout, carouse, choise, cloud, clough, clout, clouterty, compound, couch, couchant, crouch, deflower, devour, devout, doubt, doubtful, drought, doughty, douse, encounter, espouse, expound, flout, foul, flounder, found, founding, fountain, frousy, glout, gout, (a disease.) ground, grouse, grout, hound, hour, house, imbound, loud, lounge, louse, lout, mound, mountain, mountebank, mouse, mouth, noun, ounce, our, out, outer, outermost, paramount, plough, pouch, pounce, pound, punt, profound, pronoun, pronounce, prou, proud, rebound, recount, redoubt, redubbed, redound, rencounter, round, roundelay, rouse, rout, scoundrel, scour, scout, shout, shroud, slouch, spouse, spout, sprout, stout, surround, south, thou, thousand, touse, trouse, trousters, trout, wound, (did wind,) slough (a miry place,) couch, vouchsafe, without, scarumach.

314. The second sound is that of short u in but, and is heard in the following words and their compounds: Ad-journ, journey, journal, bourgeois, country, cousin, couple, accouple, double, trouble, courteous, courtesy, courage, encourage, joust, gourmet, housewife, flourish, mouch, nourish, enough, chough, rough, tough, slough, (a cast skin,) scourge, southerly, southern, southernwood, southward, touch, touchy, young, younker, and youngster; but southerly, southern, and southward, are sometimes pronounced regularly like south; this, however, is far from the prevailing pronunciation. This is the sound this diphthong always has, when the accent is not on it, unless in very few instances, where the compound retains the sound of the simple, as in pronoun; but in sojourn and sojourner, with the accent on the first syllable, and in every unaccented termination in our and ous, this diphthong has exactly the sound of short u: thus favour, honour, odour, and famous, are pronounced as if written, favur, honur, odor, and famus.

315. The third sound given to these vowels is that of oo in coo and woo, (39), and is found in the following words: Bouge, croup, group, agroup, amour, paramour, bouce, bousy, boutefeux, capouch, cartouch, fourbe, gout, (taste,) and vagout (pronounced goo and gahoo.) rendez-vous, rouge, soup, sous, (pronounced soo), surtout, through, thoroughly, toupee or toupet, you, your, youth, your, countour, tourney, tournament, pour, and route (a road,) accoutre, billet-doux, agouti, uncouth, wound (a hurt,) and routine (a beaten road). See Tourney.

316. The verb to pour is sometimes pronounced po-re, and sometimes to poor; in each case it interferes with a word of a different signification, and the best pronunciation, which is that similar to power, is as little liable to that exception as either of the others. See the word.

317. To wound is sometimes pronounced so as to rhyme with found; but this is directly contrary to the best usage: but route (a road, as to take a different route,) is often pronounced so as to rhyme with doubt, by respectable speakers.

318. The fourth sound of this diphthong is that of long ou, and is heard in the following words: Though, although, coulter, court, account, gourd, courtier, course, dis-course, source, recourse, resource, bourn, dough, doughty, four, mould, mouldy, moutt, mourn, shoulder, smoulder, soul, poultice, poult, poulterier, poultry, trout (to roll smoothly, marked by Mr. Sheridan as rhyming with doll, but more properly by Dr. Kenrick with roll), and borough, thorough, furlough, fourteen, concourse, and intercourse, preserve the diphthong in the sound of long o, though not under the accent.

319. The fifth sound of ou is like the noun awe, and is heard only in ought, bought, brought, sought, besought, fought, nought, thought, methought, wrought.

320. The sixth sound is that of short oo, or the u in bull, and is heard only in the auxiliary verbs would, could, should, rhyming with good, hood, stood, &c.

321. The seventh sound is that of short o, and heard only in cough and trough, rhyming with off and scoff; and in lough, and shough, pronounced lock and shock.

OW.

322. The elementary sound of this diphthong is the same as the first sound of ou, and is heard in how, now, &c. but the sound of long o obtains in so many instances, that it will be necessary to give a catalogue of both.

323. The general sound, as the elementary sound may be called, is heard in now, how, bow, (a mark of respect,) mow, (a heap of barley, &c.) cow, brow, brown, brouse, plow, sow, vow, avow, allow, disallow, endow, down, clown, frown, town, crown, down, gown, renown, dowager, dowdy, dower, dower, dowry, donery, dowlas, drowse, drowsy, flower, bover, lower, (to look gloomy,) potter, powder, provess, prou, prout, vowel, towel, bower, rovel, covl, scowl, crowd, shower, tower, sow, (a swine,) swins, soul, thowl, low, (to bellow as a cow.) This word is generally pronounced as low, not high; but if custom, in this case, has not absolutely decided, it ought, in my opinion, to have the first sound of this diphthong, rhyming with how, as much more expressive of the noise it signifies; which, where sounds are the ideas to be expressed, ought to have great weight in pronunciation. (241, 251.) See the word.

324. The second sound of this diphthong is heard in blow, slow, crow, grow, flow, glow, bow, (to shoot with,) know, low, (not high,) mow, (to cut grass,) row, show, sow, (to scatter grain,) strow, snow, throw, below, bestow, owe, own, owner, flown, groen, growth, know, known, sown, lower, (to bring low,) throw, thrown; in all these words the ow sounds like long o in go, no, so, &c.

325. The noun prowl, signifying the forepart of a ship, rhymes with go in Mr. Sheridan, and with now in Dr. Kenrick. The latter is, in my opinion, the preferable sound: while the verb to prow (to seek for prey,) rhymes with owl according to Mr. Sheridan, and with soul according to Dr. Kenrick: the latter has the old spelling prole to plead, but the former has, in my opinion, both analogy and the best usage on its side. Both these writers unite in giving the first sound of this diphthong to process; which is unquestionably the true pronunciation. See To Prowl.

326. The proper names Howe, Houel, Howard, and Povel, generally are heard with the first sound of this diphthong, as in how, now, &c. but Hoves, and Stow, (the historian,) commonly rhyme with knows and know. Howard, among people of rank, is generally pronounced with the second sound, rhyming with forward; and Grosvenor, as if written Grosvenor. Snowdon is frequently pronounced with the first sound of ow; but the second sound seems preferable; as it is not improbable that these mountains had their name, like the Alps, from the snow on their tops.

327. When this diphthong is in a final unaccented syllable, it has always the second sound, like long o, in borow, sorrow, fellow, willow, &c. The vulgar shorten this sound, and pronounce the o obscurely, and sometimes as if followed by r, as winder and feller, for window and fellow; but this is almost too despicable for notice. Good speakers preserve the diphthong in this situation, and give it the full sound of open o, rhyming with no, so, &c. though it should seem in Ben Jonson's time, the o in this situation was almost suppressed. See his Grammar, p. 149.

328. This diphthong, in the word knowledge, has of late years undergone a considerable revolution. Some speakers who had the regularity of their language at heart, were grieved to see the compound depart so far from the sound of the simple, and with heroic fortitude have opposed the multitude by pronouncing the first syllable of this word as it is heard in the verb to know. The Pulpit and the Bar have for some years given a sanction to this pronunciation; but the Senate and the Stage hold out inflexibly against it; and the nation at large seem insensible of the improvement. They still continue to pronounce, as in the old ludicrous rhymes—

"Among the mighty men of knowledge

That are professors at Gresham College."

But if ever this word should have the good fortune to be restored to its rights, it would be but charity to endeavour the restoration of a great number of words in a similar situation, such as breakfast, vineyard, bevilder, meadow, hearken, pleasure, whistler, shepherd, windward, and a long catalogue of fellow sufferers, (515.) But, before we endeavour this restoration, we should consider, that contracting the sound of the simple, when it acquires an additional syllable, is an idiom of pronunciation to which our language is extremely prone; nor is it certain that crossing this tendency would produce any real advantage; at least, not sufficient to counterbalance the diversity of pronunciation which must for a long time prevail, and which must necessarily call off our attention from things to words. See Encyclical Termination, Nov. 74.

OY.

329. This diphthong is but another form for oi, and is pronounced exactly like it. When alloy is written with this diphthong it ought never to be pronounced allay. Custom seems to have appropriated the former word to the noun, and the latter to the verb: for the sake of consistency, it were to be wished it were always written allay; but it is not to be expected that poets will give up so good a rhyme to joy, cloy, and destroy.

330. The only word in which this diphthong is not under the accent, is the proper name Savoy: for savoy, a plant, has the accent on the second syllable; but the diphthong in both is pronounced in the same manner.

UA.

331. When the a in this diphthong is pronounced, the u has the power of o, which unites both into one syllable: thus antiquate, antiquary, assuage, persuade, equal, language, &c. are pronounced antikwate, antikwary, aswage, &c.

332. The u in this diphthong is silent, in guard, guardian, guarantee, and piquant; pronounced gärd, gärdian, garantee, and pickant. (92.)

333. In Mantua, the town of Italy, both vowels are heard distinctly. The same may be observed of the habit so called: but in mantumaker vulgarity has sunk the a, and made it mantumaker. The same vulgarity at first, but now sanctioned by universal custom, has sunk both letters in victuals, and its compounds victualling, and victualler, pronounced, vittles, vittling, and vittler. See Mantua.

UE.

334. This diphthong, like ua, when it forms only one syllable, and both letters are pronounced, has the u sounded like o: as consuetude, desuetude, and mansuetude, which are pronounced consuetude, desuetude, and mansuetude. Thus conquest is pronounced according to the general rule, as if written conkwest; but the verb conquer has unaccountably deviated into conker, particularly upon the stage. This error, however, seems not to be so rooted in the general ear as to be above correction; and analogy undoubtedly demands conker.

335. This diphthong, when in a final syllable, sinks the e, as clue, cue, due, blue, glue, hue, flue, rué, sue, trac, mue, accrue, ensue, endue, imbue, imbrue, pursue, subdue, perdue, argue, residue, avenue, revenue, continue, retinue, construe, statue, tissue, issue, virtue, value, ague; in all these words, whether the accent be on the diphthong ue or not, it is pronounced like long open u, except in words where the r comes before u: in this case it is sounded like oo. When the accent is not on this diphthong, as in the latter portion of these words from argue, it is apt to be feebly and indistinctly pronounced, and therefore care ought to be taken to sound it as if these words were written argew, residew, &c. In Tuesday, ue, the diphthong, is pronounced in the same manner.

336. In some words the u is silent, and the e pronounced short, as in guess, guest, guerdon, where the u acts as a servile to preserve the e hard.

337. In some words both the vowels are sunk, as in antique, oblique, league, feague, teague, colleague, plague, vague, intrigue, fatigue, harangue, tongue, disembogue, collogue, rogue, prorogue, brogue, fugue; in all which the ue is silent, and the g pronounced hard. The g in antique and oblique is pronounced like k, as if the words were written anteek, and oblíke. (158.)

338. The terminations in ogue, from the Greek, are pronounced in the same manner. Thus pedagogue, demagogue, physiagogue, menagogue, emmenagogue, synagogue, mystagogue, decagogue, dialogue, trialogue, catalogue, theologue, eclogue, monologue, prologue, and epilogue, are all pronounced as if written pedagog, demagog, &c. with the o short.

339. This diphthong after r becomes oo; thus true is pronounced troo. (176.)

UI.

340. The u in this diphthong, as in ua, and ue, when both vowels are pronounced without forming two syllables, is pronounced like o: thus languid, anguish, language, extinguish, distinguish, relinquish, vanquish, linguist, penguin, pursuivant, guaiacum, are pronounced as if written languoid, anguish, &c. and cuisse and cuissees, as if written kuisse and kuissees, and cuirass, as if written kuirass.

341. The u is silent, and the i pronounced long, in guide, disguise, guile, and bequile; but the u is silent, and the i short, in guilt, build, guilt, guinea, guitar. Guilt in Guilford is, by the lower people of London, pronounced so as to rhyme with child; but this is directly opposite to the best usage, and contrary to its etymology, as it is a compound of guilt (a corporation, always pronounced like the verb to gild), and hall. Dr. Jones, who wrote in Queen Anne's time, tells us it was then pronounced as if written Gildhall. In circuit and biscuit the u is merely servile; in both the c is hard, and the i short, as if written surkit and biskit. Conduit is pronounced cundit.

342. In juice, sluice, suit, and pursuit, the i is silent, and the u has its diphthongal sound, as it preceded by e, and the words were written sleuse, jeuse, seut, purséut.

343. When this diphthong is preceded by r, it is pronounced like oo: thus bruiſe, cruise, fruit, bruit, recruit, are pronounced as if written broose, croose, broot, recroot. (339.)

UO.

344. The u in this diphthong is pronounced like w in quote, quota, quotation, quotient, quodidian, quorum, quondam, silique, quoth, as if written kwote, kwota, kwotation, &c. Coif and coit, commonly pronounced kwioif and kwioit, do not come under this class. See the words.

UY.

345. This diphthong, with the accent on it, sinks the u, and pronounces the y like long i: thus buy, the only word where uy has the accent, rhymes with dry, fly, &c. When the accent is not on this diphthong it is sounded like long e, as plaguy, roguy, gluy, pronounced pla-gee, rogee, (with the g hard, as in get), glu-ee. The same may be observed of oblogy, amblogy, pavcology, soliloquy, ventriloquy, allogy, collogy, pronounced oblo-quee, amblo-quee, &c.

UOY.

346. This diphthong is found only in the word buoy, pronounced as if written buoy, but too often exactly like boy. But this ought to be avoided by correct speakers.

OF THE CONSONANTS.

B.

347. When b follows m in the same syllable it is generally silent, as in lamb, kemb, limb, comb, dwab, jamb, &c. except accumb, and succumb: it is silent also before t in the same syllable, as in debt, doubt, redoubt, redoubted, and their compounds: it is silent before t, when not in the same syllable, in the word subtle, (cunning), often inaccurately used for subtile, (fine), where the b is always pronounced. In the mathematical term rhomb the b is always heard, and the word pronounced as if written rhumb. Amb-ace is pronounced Aims-ace. See Rhomb.

C.

348. C is always hard like k before a, o, and u; as card, cord, curd; and soft, like s before e, i, and y; as cement, city, cynick.

349. When c ends a word or syllable, it is always hard, as in music, flaccid, siccity, pronounced musik, flak-sid, sik-sity. See Exaggerate.

350. In the word sceptick, where the first e, according to analogy, ought to be pronounced like s, Dr. Johnson has not only given his approbation to the sound of k, but has, contrary to general practice, spelt the word sceptick. It may be observed, perhaps, in this, as on other occasions, of that truly great man, that he is but seldom wrong; but when he is so, that he is generally wrong to absurdity. What a monster does this word sceptick appear to an eye the least classical or correct! And if this alteration be right, why should we hesitate to write and pronounce scene, sceptre, and Lacedæmon, skene, skeptre, and Lakedæmon, as there is the same reason for k in all! It is not however my intention to cross the general current of polite and classical pronunciation, which I know is that of sounding the c like k; my objection is only to writing it with the k; and in this I think I am supported by the best authorities since the publication of Johnson's Dictionary.

351. C is mute in Czar, Czarina, victuals, indict, arbuscle, corpuscle, and muscle; it sounds like tch in the Italian words vermicelli, and violoncello; and like z in suffice, sacrifice, sice, (the number six at dice), and discern.

352. This letter, when connected with h, has two sounds; the one like tch in child, chair, rich, which, &c. pronounced as if written tchid, tchair, ritch, whitch, &c.; the other like sh, after l or n, as in belch, bench, filch, &c. pronounced belsh, bensh, filsh, &c. This latter sound is generally given to words from the French, as chaise, chagrín, chamade, champagne, champignon, chandelier, chaperon, charlatan, chevalier, chevron, chicane, capuchin, cartouch, machine, machinist, chancere, marchioness.

353. Ch in words from the learned languages, are generally pronounced like k, as chalcography, chalchate, chamæleon, chamomile, chaos, character, chart, chasm, chely, chemist, (if derived from the Arabic), and chymist, if from the Greek,) chersonese, chimera, chirography, chironomancy, chlorosis, choler, chorus, chora, chorography, chyle and its compounds; anchor, anchoret, catechry, catechism, catechise, catechetical, catechumen, echo, echinus, epoch, epocha, ichor, machination, mechanical, mechanick, mechanical, orchestra, orehestre, technical, anarch, anarchy, conch, cochleary, distich, hemistich, monostich, eunuch, monarch, monarchical, hierarch, heresiarch, pentateuch, stomach, stomachick, scheme, school, scholar, schesis, mastich, seneschal, and in all words where it is followed by r, as Christ, Christian, chronology, chronicle, &c. To these may be added the Celtick word loch (a lake.) The exceptions are charity, archer, and archery.

354. When arch, signifying chief, begins a word from the Greek language, and is followed by a vowel, it is always pronounced ark, as in archangel, archipelago, architect, archives, archetype, archaism, archiepiscopal, archidiaconal, architrave, archaology. But when we prefix arch to a word of our own, and this word begins with a consonant, we pronounce it so as to rhyme with marsh, as archduke, archdeacon, archbishop; and sometimes, when the following word begins with a vowel, if it is a composition of our own, and the word does not come to us compounded from the Greek or Latin, as arch-enemy.

355. The word ache, (a pain,) pronounced ake, comes from the Greek, and was by Shakspeare extended to two syllables, aches with ch, as in atches; but this is obsolete. It is now almost universally written ake and akes, except where it is compounded with another word, as head-ach, heart-ach, &c. and by thus absurdly retaining the ch in the compound we are puzzled how to form the plural, without pronouncing aches in two syllables.

356. In choir and chorister the ch is almost universally pronounced like qu (300.) in ostrich, like age, as if spelled ostridge. It is silent in schedule, schism, and yacht; pronounced seddulle, sizm, and yot. It is sunk in drachm, but heard in drachma; pronounced dram and drackma.

357. When c comes after the accent, either primary or secondary, and is followed by ea, ie, io, or eous, it takes the sound of sh: thus ocean, social, Phocion, saponaceous, fasciation, negociation, are pronounced as if written oshean, soshial, Phoshion, saponasheous, &c. (195.) Financier has the accent after the c, which on that account does not go into sh.

358. In order to have a just idea of the alterations of sound this letter undergoes, it will be necessary to consider its near relation to T. (41.) These consonants, like p, and b, f, and v, k, and hard g, and s, and z, are letters of the same organ; they differ by the nicest shades of sound, and are easily convertible into each other; t, p, f, k, and s, may, for the sake of distinction, be called sharp, and d, b, v, g, and z, may be called flat. For this reason, when a singular ends in a sharp consonant, the s, which forms the plural, preserves its sharp sound, as in cuffs, packs, lips, hats, deaths; and when the singular ends with a flat consonant, the plural s has the sound of z, as drabs, bags, beads, lines, &c. pronounced drabz, bagz, &c.

359. In the same manner when a verb ends with a sharp consonant, the d, in the termination ed, assumed by the preterit and participle, becomes sharp, and is sounded like t: thus stuffed, tripped, cracked, passed, vouched, faced, where the e is suppressed, as it always ought to be, (except when we are pronouncing the language of Scripture,) (104) change the d into t, as if written stuft, tript, crackt, past, voucht, faste. So when the verb ends in a flat consonant, the d preserves its true flat sound, as drubbed, pegged, lived, buzzed, where the e is suppressed, and the words pronounced in one syllable, as if written drubb'd, pegg'd, liv'd, buzz'd. It may be observed too, that when the verb ends in a liquid, or a liquid and mute e, the participle d always preserves its pure sound: as blamed, joined, filled, barred, pronounced blam'd, join'd, fill'd, barr'd. This contraction of the participial ed, and the verbal en (103.) is so fixed an idiom of our pronunciation, that to alter it, would be to alter the sound of the whole language. It must, however, be regretted, that it subjects our tongue to some of the most hissing, snapping, clashing, grinding sounds that ever grated the ears of a Vandal: thus rasped, scratched, wrenched, bridled, fangled, birchen, hardened, strengthened, quicken'd, &c. almost frighten us when written as they are actually pronounced, as raspt, scratcht, wrencht, bridl'd, fang'd, birch'n, streath'n'd, quick'n'd, &c.: they become still more formidable when used contractively in the solemn style, which never ought to be the case: for here, instead of thou strengthen'st or strengthen'd'st, thou quick'n'st or quick'n'd'st, we ought to pronounce, thou strengthen'st or strengthen'st, thou quick'n'st or quick'n'st, which are sufficiently harsh of all conscience. (See No. 495.) But to compensate for these Gothick sounds, which, however, are not without their use, our language is full of the smoothest and most sonorous terminations of the Greeks and Romans.

360. By the foregoing rule of contraction, arising from the very nature of the letters, we see the absurdity of substituting the t for ed, when the verb ends in a sharp consonant; for, when the pronunciation cannot be mistaken it is folly to alter the orthography; thus the Distressed Mother, the title of a tragedy, needs not to be written Distrest Mother, as we generally find it, because, though we write it in the former manner, it must necessarily be pronounced in the latter.

361. By this rule, too, we may see the impropriety of writing blest for blessed, when a participle.

"Blest in thy genius, in thy love too blest."—Pope.

But when the word blessed is an adjective, it ought always to be pronounced, even in the most familiar conversation, in two syllables, as this is a blessed day, the blessed thistle, &c.

362. This word, with learned, cursed, and winged, are the only participial adjectives which are constantly pronounced in two syllables, where the participles are pronounced in one: thus a learned man, a cursed thing, a winged horse, preserve the ed in a distinct syllable; while the same words, when verbs, as he learned to write, he cursed the day, they winged their flight, are heard in one syllable, as if written learn'd, curst, and wing'd: the d in curs'd changing to t, from its following the sharp consonant s. (358.)

363. Poetry, however, (which has been one great cause of improper orthography,) assumes the privilege of using these words, when adjectives, either as monosyllables or dissyllables; but correct prose rigidly exacts the pronunciation of ed in these words, when adjectives, as a distinct syllable. The ed in aged and winged, always make a distinct syllable, as an aged man; the winged courser: but when this word is compounded with another, the ed does not form a syllable, as a full-arg'd horse, a sheath-wing'd fowl.

364. It is, perhaps, worthy of notice, that when adjectives are changed into adverbs by the addition of the termination ly, we often find the participial termination ed preserved long and distinct, even in those very words where it was contracted when used adjectively: thus though we always hear confess'd, profess'd, design'd, &c. we as constantly hear confess-ed-ly, pro-fess-ed-ly, de-sign-ed-ly, &c. The same may be observed of the following list of words, which by the assistance of the Rhyming Dictionary, I am enabled to give as, perhaps, the only words in the language in which the ed is pronounced as a distinct syllable in the adverb, where it is contracted in the participial adjective: Forcely, enforc'dly, unveil'dly, deform'dly, feign'dly, unfeign'dly, discern'dly, resign'dly, reign'dly, restrain'dly, concern'dly, unconcern'dly, discern'dly, undiscern'dly, preparedly, assur'dly, advis'dly, dispers'dly, diffus'dly, confus'dly, unperceiv'dly, resolv'dly, deserv'dly, undeserv'dly, reserv'dly, unreserv'dly, accus'dly, perplex'dly, fix'dly, amaz'dly.

365. To this catalogue, may be added several abstract substantives formed from participles in ed: which ed makes a distinct syllable in the former, though not in the latter, thus: numb'dness, blear'dness, preparedness, assur'dness, diseas'dness, advis'dness, reposedness, compos'dness, indisposedness, diffus'dness, confus'dness, distress'dness, resolv'dness, reserv'dness, perplex'dness, fix'dness, amaz'dness, have ed pronounced distinctly.

366. The adjectives naked, wicked, picked, (pointed,) hooked, crooked, forked, tusk'd, tress'd, and wretch'd, are not derived from verbs, and are therefore pronounced in two syllables. The same may be observed of scab'd, crab'd, chubb'd, stubb'd, shagg'd, snag'd, ragg'd, cragg'd, scrubb'd, dogg'd, rugg'd, scragg'd, hawk'd, jagg'd; to which we may add the solemn pronunciation of stiffneck'd; and these, when formed into nouns by the addition of ness, preserve the ed in a distinct syllable, as wickedness, scab'dness, ragg'dness, &c.

367. Pass'd, in the sense of beyond, becomes a preposition, and may allowably be written past, as past twelve o'clock: but when an adjective, though it is pronounced in one syllable, it ought to be written with two, as pass'd pleasures are present pain: this I know is contrary to usage; but usage is in this case, contrary to good sense, and the settled analogy of the language.

368. It needs scarcely be observed, that when the verb ends in t or d, the ed in the past time and participle has the d pronounced with its own sound, and always forms an additional syllable, as land'd, matt'd, &c. otherwise the final d could not be pronounced at all.

369. And here perhaps it may not be useless to take notice of the very imperfect and confused idea that is given in Lowth's grammar, of what are called contracted verbs, such as snatcht, checkt, snapt, mixt, dwelt, and past, for snate ɪd, checked, snapped, mixed, dwelled, and passed. To these are added, those that end in l, m, and n, or p, after a diphthong; which either shorten the diphthong, or change it into a single vowel; and instead of ed, take t only for the preterit, as dealt, dreamt, meant, felt, slept, crept; and these are said to be considered not as irregular, but contracted only. Now, nothing can be clearer, than that verbs of a very different kind are here huddled together as of the same. Snatched, checked, snapped, mixed, and passed, are not irregular at all; if they are ever written snatcht, checkt, snapt, mixt, and past, it is from pure ignorance of analogy, and not considering that if they were written with ed, unless we were to pronounce it as a distinct syllable, contrary to the most settled usage of the language, the pronunciation, from the very nature of the letters, must be the same. It is very different with dwelled; here, as a liquid, and not a sharp mute, ends the verb, d might be pronounced without going into t, just as well as in fell'd, the participle of to fell (to cut down trees.) Here then we find custom has determined an irregularity, which cannot be altered, without violence to the language; dwelt may be truly called an irregular verb, and dwelt the preterit and participle.

370. The same may be observed of deal, dream, mean, feel, weep, sleep, and creep. It is certain we can pronounce d after the four first of these words, as well as in sealed, screamed, cleaned, and reeled; but custom has not only annexed t to the preterit of these verbs, but has changed the long diphthongal sound into a short one; they are therefore doubly irregular. Weep, sleep, and creep, would not have required t to form their preterits, any more than peeped, and steeped; but custom, which has shortened the diphthong in the former words, very naturally annexed t as the simplest method of conveying the sound.

371. The only two words which occasion some doubt about classing them are, to learn and to spell. The vulgar (who are no contemptible guides on this occasion) pronounce them in the preterit learn't and spell't; but as n and l would readily admit of a d after them, it seems more correct to favour a tendency to regularity, both in writing and speaking, which the literary world has given into, by spelling them learn'd and spell'd: thus earn'd, the preterit of to earn, has been recovered from the vulgar earnt, and made a perfect rhyme to discern'd.

372. To these observations may be added, that, in such irregular verbs as have the present, the preterit, and participle the same, as cast, cost, cut, &c. the second person singular of the preterit of these verbs takes d before the est, as I cast, or did cast; Thou castedst, or didst cast, &c. for if this were not the case, the second person of the preterit might be mistaken for the second person of the present tense.

373. I have been led insensibly to these observations by their connexion with pronunciation; and if the reader should think them too remote from the subject, I must beg his pardon, and resume my remarks on the sound of the letter d.

374. The vulgar drop this letter in ordinary, and extraordinary, and make them or'nary and extr'or'nary; but this is a gross abbreviation; the best pronunciation is sufficiently short, which is ord'nary, and extr'ord'nary: the first in three and the last in four syllables; but solem speaking preserves the i, and makes the latter word consist of five syllables, as if written extr'ordinary.

375. Our ancestors, feeling the necessity of showing the quantity of a vowel followed by ge, when it was to be short, inserted d, as wedge, ridge, badge, &c. The same reason induced them to write colledge, and alledge, with the d; but modern reformers, to the great injury of the language, have expelled the d, and left the vowel to shift for itself; because there is no d in the Latin words from which these are derived.

376. D, like t, to which it is so nearly related, when it comes after the accent, either primary or secondary, (522,) and is followed by the diphthong ie, io, ia, or ou, slides into gh, or the consonant j; thus soldier is universally and justly pronounced as if written sol-jeer; grandeur, gran-jeur; and verdure, (where it must be remembered that u is a diphthong,) ver-jeure: and, for the same reason, education is elegantly pronounced ed-ju-cation. But duke and reduce, pronounced juke and re-juce, where the accent is after the d, cannot be too much reprobated.

F.

377. F has its pure sound in often, off, &c. but, in the proposition of, slides into its near relation v, as if written ov. But when this proposition is in composition at the end of a word, the f becomes pure; thus, though we sound of singly ov, we pronounce it as if the f were double in whereof.

378. There is a strong tendency to change the f into v in some words, which confounds the plural number and the genitive case: thus we often hear of a wife's jointure, a calve's head, and house rent, for wife's jointure, a calf's head, and house rent.

G.

379. G, like C, has two sounds, a hard and a soft one: it is hard before a, o, u, l, and r, as game, gone, gull, glory, grandeur. Gae is the only exception; now more commonly written jail. (212.)

380. G before e and i is sometimes hard and sometimes soft: it is generally soft before words of Greek, Latin, or French original, and hard before words from the Saxon. These latter, forming by far the smaller number, may be considered as exceptions.

381. G is hard before a, in gear, geck, geece, geld, gelt, gelding, get, geu-gau, shagged, snagged, ragged, cragged, scraggled, dogged, rugged, dagger, snagger, stagger, trigger, dogger, pettifogger, tiger, auger, eager, meager, anger, finger, linger, conger, longer, stronger, younger, lungest, strongest, youngest. The last six of these words are generally pronounced in Ireland, so as to let the g remain in its nasal sound without articulating the succeeding vowel: thus longer (more long) is so pronounced as to sound exactly like the noun a long-er (one who longs or wishes for a thing); the same may be observed of the rest. That the pronunciation of Ireland is analogical, appears from the same pronunciation of g in string-y, spring-y, full of strings and springs; and wronger and wrongest, for more and most wrong. But though resting the g in the nasal sound, without articulating the succeeding vowel, is absolutely necessary in verbal nouns derived from verbs ending in ing, as singer, bringer, slinger, &c. pronounced sing-er, bring-er, sling-er, &c. and not sing-ger, bring-ger, sling-ger, &c. yet in longer, stronger, and younger, longest, strongest, and youngest, the g ought always to articulate the e: thus younger ought always to rhyme with the termination monger, which has always the g hard, and articulating the vowel; and this pronunciation is approved by Mr. Nares. Forget, target, and together fall into this class. See No. 409.

382. G is hard before i in gibbe, gibeat, gibber, gibberish, gibbous, giddy, gift, gig, giggle, giglet, (properly gigglet), gild, gill, (of a fish) gimlet, gimp, gird, girdle, girl, girth, gizzard, begin, give, forgive, biggin, piggin, noggin: also derivatives from nouns or verbs ending in hard g, as druggist, waggish, riggish, huggish, doggish, sluggish, rigging, digging, &c.

383. G before y is generally soft, as in elegy, apology, &c. and almost in all words from the learned languages; but hard in words from the Saxon, which are formed from nouns or verbs ending in g hard, as shaggy, jaggy, knaggy, snaggy, craggy, seraggy, quaggy, snoggy, draggy, spriggy, twigggy, boggy, foggy, cluggy, bugggy, mugggy. Gyve, from its Celtic original, ought to have the g hard, but has decidedly adopted the soft g.

GN in the same Syllable at the Beginning of a Word.

384. The g in this situation is always silent, as gnaw, gnash, gnat, gnarl, gnomon, gnomonicks, pronounced naw, nash, nat, narl, nonon, mononicks.

GN in the same Syllable at the End of a Word

385. No combination of letters has more puzzled the critics than this. Two actresses of distinguished merit in Portia in the Merchant of Venice pronounced the word impugn differently, and each found her advocate in the newspapers. One critic affirmed, that Miss Young, by preserving the sound of g, pronounced the word properly; and the other contended that Mrs. Yates was more judicious in leaving it out. The former was charged with harshness; the latter with mutilating the word, and weakening its sound; but if analogy may decide, it is clearly in favour of the latter; for there is no axiom in our pronunciation more indisputable than that which makes g silent before n in the same syllable. This is constantly the case in sign, and all its compounds, as resign, design, consign, assign; and in indign, condign, malign, benign; all pronounced as if written sine, rezine, &c. In which words we find the vowel i long and open, to compensate, as it were, for the suppression of g, as every other word ending in gn, when the accent is on the syllable, has a diphthong pronounced like a long open vowel, as arraign, campaign, feign, reign, deign; and consequently, unless the vowel a can produce some special privilege which the other vowels have not, we must, if we pronounce according to analogy, make the a in this situation long, and sound impugn as if written impune.

386. The same analogy will oblige us to pronounce impregn, oppugn, expugn, propugn, as if written imprene, oppune, expune, propune, not only when these verbs are in the infinitive mood, but in the preterits, participles, and verbal nouns formed from them, as impugned, impugning, and impugner, must be pronounced impuned, impuning, and impuner. The same may be observed of the rest. Perhaps it will gratify a curious observer of pronunciation to see the diversity and uncertainty of our orthoepists in their notation of the words before us.

impune. Sheridan, Scott, Nares, Murray. Barclay says the g in this word and its derivatives is mute, but takes no notice of the quantity of the u.

impūn. Buchanan, Kenrick, Perry.

impūng. W. Johnston.

oppune. Sheridan, Scott, Nares, Murray.

oppūn. Kenrick, Perry, Barclay.

oppūng. W. Johnston.

propūne. Sheridan, Scott, Perry, Nares.

propūng. Barclay.

imprēne. Nares, Murray.

imprēn. Sheridan, Kenrick, Perry. Barclay says the g is mute, but says nothing of the quantity of the e.

expūn. Perry, Barclay.

impūner. Sheridan.

impūnner. Perry, Barclay.

oppūgnr. Sheridan.

propūgnr. Sheridan.

propūncr. Scott.

propūnner. Perry.

Nothing is clearer than that all these words ought to follow the same fortune, and should be pronounced alike. How then shall he reconcile Mr. Sheridan's pronouncing impugn, oppugn, expugn, and propugn, with the u long, and impregn with the e short? Kenrick, who has not the word propugn, is consistent in pronouncing the rest with the vowel short. The same may be observed of Scott, who adopts the long sound, but has not the word impregn. Mr. Perry gives the short sound to all but propugn, where he makes the u long, but absurdly makes the verbal noun propunner; and W. Johnston, who has only impugn and oppugn, pronounces the vowel short, and spells them impung and oppung. Barclay, under the word impugn, says the g in this word and its derivatives is mute, without noticing the quantity of the vowels, but spells oppugn, oppun; and of impregn, only says the g is mute; but writes propugn, propung, in the manner that W. Johnston does impugn and oppugn: but Mr. Nares observes, that analogy seems to require a similar pronunciation in all these words, and that the vowel should be long. The same inconsistency is observable in Mr. Sheridan's pronunciation of the verbal nouns; for he expunges the g in impugner, and writes it impuner, but preserves it in oppugner and propugner. Mr. Scott has only the word propugner, which he very properly, as well as consistently, spells propuner. Mr. Perry has propunner and impunner, and Barclay impuner only.—The inconsistency here remarked arises from not attending to the analogy of pronunciation, which requires every verbal noun to be pronounced exactly like the verb, with the mere addition of the termination: thus singer is only adding er to the verb sing, without suffering the g to articulate the e as it does in finger and linger, &c. The same may be observed of a signer, one who signs: and as a corroboration of this doctrine, we may take notice that the additional er and est, in the comparatives and superlatives of adjectives, make no alteration in the sound of the radical word: this is obvious in the words benigner, benignest, &c. except younger, longer, and stronger. See No. 381.

387. But in every other compound where these letters occur, the n articulates the latter syllable, and g is heard distinctly in the former, as sig-ni-fy, maligni-fy, assign-nation, &c. Some affected speakers, either ignorant of the rules for pronouncing English, or over-complaisant to the French, pronounce physiognomy, cognizance, and recognizance, without the g; but this is a gross violation of the first principles of spelling. The only words to keep these speakers in countenance are poignant, and champignon, not long ago imported from France, and pronounced pointant, championion. The first of these words will be probably hereafter written without the g; while the latter, confined to the kitchen, may be looked upon as technical, and allowed an exclusive privilege. See Cognizance.

388. Bagnio, seignior, seraglio, intaglio, and oglio, pronounced ban-yo, seen-yur, seral-yo, intal-yo, and ele-yo, may be considered as foreign coxcombs, and treated with civility, by omitting the g, while they do not pervert the pronunciation of our native English words

GM in the same Syllable.

389. What has been said of gn is applicable to gm. We have but one word in the language where these letters end a word with the accent on it, and that is phlegm: in this the g is always mute, and the e, according to analogy, ought to be pronounced long, as if the word were written flem; but a short pronunciation of the e has generally obtained, and we commonly hear it flem; it is highly probable Pope pronounced it properly, where he says,

"Our criticks take a contrary extreme;
They judge with fury, but they write with phlegm."
Essay on Criticism.

Perhaps it would not be difficult to reduce this word to analogy, as some speakers still pronounce the e long: but in the compounds of this word, as in those where gm occur, the vowel is shortened, and the g pronounced, as in phleg-mon, phleg-monous, phleg-matick, and phleg-magogues; though Mr. Sheridan, for no reason I can conceive, sinks the g in the last word. When these letters end a syllable not under the accent, the g is silent, but the preceding vowel is shortened: thus paradigm, paragegm, diaphragm, apophthegm, are pronounced paradim, parapem, diaphram, apothem.

GH.

390. This combination, at the beginning of a word, drops the h, as in ghost, ghastly, aghost, gherkin, pronounced gost, rhyming with most, gustly, agast, guerkin; but when these letters come at the end of a word, they form some of the greatest anomalies in our language; gh, at the end of words, is generally silent, and consequently the preceding vowel or diphthong is long, as high, nigh, thigh, neigh, weigh, weigh, eugh, (the obsolete way of spelling yew, a tree,) bough, dough, though, although, clough, (a cliff,) plough, furlough, slough, (a miry place,) through, throughout, thorough, borough, usquebaugh, pugh!

391. Gh is frequently pronounced like f, as laugh, laughter, cough, chough, clough, (an allowance in weight,) slough, (the cast skin of a snake or sore,) enough, rough, tough, trough.

392. Gh is sometimes changed into ck, as hough, shough, lough, pronounced hock, shock, lock; sometimes we hear only the g sounded, as in burgh, burgher, and burghership.

GHT.

393. Gh in this termination is always silent, as fight, night, bought, fought, &c. The only exception is draught; which, in poetry, is most frequently rhymed with caught, taught, &c.; but in prose, is so universally pronounced as if written draft, that the poetical sound of it grows uncouth, and is becoming obsolete. Draughts, the game, is also pronounced drafts. Drought, (dryness) is vulgarly pronounced drowth: it is even written so by Milton; but in this he is not to be imitated, having mistaken the analogy of this word, as well as that of height, which he spells hight, and which is frequently so pronounced by the vulgar. See the words Height and Drought.

H.

394. This letter is no more than breathing forcibly before the succeeding vowel is pronounced. At the beginning of words, it is always sounded, except in heir, heires, honest, honesty, honour, honourable, herb, herbage, hospital, hostler, hour, humble, humour, humorous, humorous. Ben Jonson leaves out the h in host, and classes it in this respect with honest.

395. H is always silent after r, as rhetoric, rhap-sody, rheum, rheumatism, rhinoceros, rhomb, rhubarb, myrrh, catarrh, and their compounds.

396. H final, preceded by a vowel is always silent, as ah! hah! oh! fogh! sirrah, hallelujah, Messiah.

397. This letter is often sunk after w, particularly in the capital, where we do not find the least distinction of sound between while and wile, whet and wet, where and wear. Trifling as this difference may appear at first sight, it tends greatly to weaken and impoverish the pronunciation, as well as sometimes to confound words of a very different meaning. The Saxons as Dr. Lowth observes, placed the h before the w, as hwa; and this is certainly its true place; for in the pronunciation of all words beginning with w, we ought to breathe forcibly before we pronounce the w, as if the words were written hoo-at, hoo-ile, &c. and then we shall avoid that feeble, cockney pronunciation which is so disagreeable to a correct ear.

J.

398 J is pronounced exactly like soft g, and is perfectly uniform in its sound, except in the word hallo-lujah, where it is pronounced like y.

K.

399. K has exactly the sound of hard c: it is always silent before n in the same syllable, as knee, kneel, knack, knight, know, knuckle, knab, knag, knap, knare, knave, knit, knock, knot, knoll.

400. It has been a custom within these twenty years to omit the k at the end of words when preceded by c. This has introduced a novelty into the language, which is that of ending a word with an unusual letter, and is not only a blemish in the face of it, but may possibly produce some irregularity in future formations; for mimicking must be written with the k, though to mimic is without it. If we use colic as a verb, which is not uncommon, we must write colick-ing and colicked: and though physicking and physicked, are not the most elegant words, they are not quite out of the line of formation. This omission of k is, however, too general to be counteracted, even by the authority of Johnson: but it is to be hoped it will be confined to words from the learned languages: and indeed, as there is not the same vanity of appearing learned in the Saxon as in the Latin and Greek, there is no great fear that thick and stick will lose their k, though they never had it in the original.

L.

401. Ben Jonson says L melteth in the sounding, and is therefore called a liquid. This, however, cannot be the reason that r is called a liquid: for no two letters can, in this respect, be more opposite. See No. 21.

L is mute in almond, calf, half, calve, halve, chaldron, falcon, folk, yolk, (better written yelk with the l sounded,) fusil, halser, malmsay, salmon, salve, talbot (a species of dog.) See Salve.

402. L is mute also between a and k in the same syllable, as balk, chalk, talk, stalk, walk.

403. L is silent likewise between a and m in the same syllable, as alms, balm, calm, palm, psalm, qualm, shalm; but when the m is detached from the l by commencing another syllable, the l becomes audible. Thus, though the l is mute in psalm, palm, it is always heard in psal-mist, psal-mody, and pal-mistry; but in bulmy and palmy, where the y is an adjective termination of our own, no alteration is made in the sound of the substantive which sinks the l (386.) Calmer and calmest ought to have the l mute, as they are only degrees of comparison; and palmer, and palmerworm (except in the language of Scripture, where the l in palmerworm ought to be heard,) are only a sort of verbal nouns, which never alter the sound of the original word, and therefore ought to have the l mute. But though l is sometimes mute in the noun salve, and in the verb to salve, it is always heard in salver (a kind of plate.) See Salve.

404. L ought always to be suppressed in the auxiliary verbs would, could, should: it is sometimes suppressed in fault; but this suppression is become vulgar, (see the word.) In soldier, likewise, the l is sometimes suppressed, and the word pronounced so-ger; but this is far from being the most correct pronunciation: l ought always to be heard in this word, and its compounds soldierly, soldiership, &c.

405. L, preceded by a mute, and followed by e, in a final syllable, has an imperfect sound, which does not do much honour to our language. The l, in this situation, is neither sounded like el nor le, but ie final is suppressed, and the preceding mute articulates the l, without either a preceding or a succeeding vowel; so that this sound may be called a monster in Grammar—a syllable without a vowel! This will easily be perceived in the words able, table, circle, &c. which are pronounced as if written abl, tabl, circl, &c. and in those still more Gothic and uncouth abbreviated participial terminations, peopled, bridled, saddled, trifles, gaffes, &c. pronounced pee-pl'd, bri-dl'd, sad-dl'd, tri-f-ē, gaf-flz, &c. (359) (472.)

406. This letter has not only, like f and s, the privilege of doubling itself at the end of a word, but it has an exclusive privilege of being double where they remain single; though by what right cannot well be conceived. Thus, according to the general rule, when a verb ends in a single consonant, preceded by a single vowel, and the accent is on the last syllable, the consonant is doubled when a participial termination is added, as abet, abetting, beg, begging, begin, beginning, &c. but when the accent is not on the last syllable of the verb, the consonant remains single, as suffered, suffering, benefiting, &c. but the l is doubled whether the accent be on the last syllable or not, as duelling, levelling, virtualling, travelling, traveller, &c. This gross irregularity, however, would not have been taken notice of in this place, if it had not suggested an absurdity in pronunciation, occasioned by the omission of l. Though the latter l is useless in traveller, virtualer, &c. it is not so in controller: for as ll is a mark of the deep broad sound of a in ball, tall, all, &c. (84.) so the same letters are the sign of the long open sound of o in boli (a round stalk of a plant), to joli, noli, (the head,) knoli, (a little hill,) poli, clodpoli, roll, scroll, droll, troll, stroll, toll: for which reason, leaving out one l in de-thral, catal, miscal, overfal, forestal, reinstal, down-fal, withal, control, and unrol, as we find them in Johnson's Dictionary, is an omission of the utmost importance to the sound of the words; for as the pronunciation sometimes alters the spelling, so the spelling sometimes alters the pronunciation.* Accordingly we find some speakers, chiefly the natives of Ireland, inclined to give the a its middle sound, to words commencing with al, followed by another consonant, because they do not see the ll in the all with which these words are compounded: thus we sometimes hear Almighty, albeit, so pronounced as to make their first syllable rhyme with the first of al-ley, val-ley; and extol is pronounced by the Scotch so as to rhyme with coal; and with just as much reason as we pronounce control in the same manner. For though compounds may, in some cases, be allowed to drop such letters of their simples, as either are not necessary to the sound, as in Christmas; or might possibly lead to a wrong one, as in Reconcilable (which see;) yet where, by omitting a letter, the sound may be altered, the omission is pernicious and absurd. (84.) The same observations might be extended to the numerous termination full, where, in compounds, one l is omitted, though nothing can be more certain, than that ful, with a single l, has not the same sound as when this letter is doubled; for who could suppose, without being used to the absurdity, that fulfil should stand for fulfill? but this abbreviation is too inordinate and extensive to afford any hope, that the great arbiters of orthography, the printers, will ever submit to the additional trouble of putting another l

M.

407. M preserves its sound in every word, except comptroller; compt and account are now universally written as they are pronounced, count and account; and though m and p are preserved to the eye in the officer called a comptroller, the word is pronounced exactly like the noun controller, one who controls.

N.

408. N has two sounds; the one simple and pure, as in man, net, &c.; the other compounded and mixed, as in hang, thank, &c. The latter sound is heard when it is followed by the sharp or flat guttural mutes g hard, or k; or its representatives c hard, qu or x; but it may be observed, that so prone is our language to the flat mutes, that when n is followed by k, or its representatives, the flat mute g seems interposed between them: thus thank, banquet, anxious, are pronounced as if written, not than-k, ban-quet, an-xious, but thang-k, banquet, anghshus. But this collision of the sound of n and g, or hard c, is only when the accent is on them; for when the g or hard c articulates the accented syllable, the n becomes pure: thus, though congress and congregate are pronounced as if written cong-gress, and cong-gregate, yet the first syllable of congratulate, and congressive, ought to be pronounced without the ringing sound of n, and exactly like the same syllable in

* This omission of the letter L, I see, has been rectified in the last quarto edition of Johnson's Dictionary; and it would have been well if the Editors had acknowledged their obligations and extended the emendations to the word codle, and several others.

contrary. The same difference may be observed in the words concourse and concur; the first word, which has the accent on the first syllable, is pronounced as if written con-course; and the last, which has the accent on the second syllable, with a pure. It must, however, be carefully observed, that the secondary accent has the same power of melting the n into the succeeding hard g or c as the primary (522;) thus congregation and concrementation have the first syllable pronounced as if written cong.

409. It may, perhaps, be worthy of notice, that when n is followed by k, the k has a finished or complete sound, as in link, think, &c.; but when n is followed by hard g, the g has an unfinished or imperfect sound as in hang, bang, &c. where we may observe the tongue to rest upon the palate in the sound of g; but when this letter is carried off to articulate another syllable, its sound is completed, as in anger, and Bangor (the name of a town,) where the sound of g may be perceived to be very different from the noun hanger, (a sword,) and danger, (one who beats or bangs.) This perfect sound of g is heard in all simple, as anger, angle, finger, linger, conger, anguish, language, distinguish, extinguish, anguent; but in words derived from verbs or adjectives, ending in ng, the g continues imperfect, as it was in the theme. Thus a singer (one who sings) does not finish the g like finger, but is merely er added to sing: the same may be observed of sing-ing, bring-ing, and hang-ing. So adjectives formed by the addition of y have the imperfect sound of g, as in the original word; thus springy, stringy, dungy, and wingy, are only the sound of e added to spring, string, dung, and wing; but the comparative and superlative adjectives, longer, stronger, and younger; longest, strongest, and youngest, have the g hard and perfectly sounded, as if written long-ger, strong-ger, young-ger, &c. where the g is hard, as in fin-ger, lin-ger, &c. And it may be looked upon as a general rule, that nouns, adjectives or verbs, do not alter their original sound upon taking an additional syllable. In these three words, therefore, the Irish pronunciation more agreeably to analogy than the English, for, if I mistake not, they do not articulate the g. (381.)

410. Hitherto we have considered these letters as they are heard under the accent; but when they are unaccented in the participial termination ing, they are frequently a cause of embarrassment to speakers who desire to pronounce correctly. We are told, even by teachers of English, that ing, in the word singing, bringing, and swinging, must be pronounced with the ringing sound, which is heard when the accent is on these letters, in king, sing, and ring, and not as if written without the g, as singin, bringin, swingin. No one can be a greater advocate than I am for the strictest adherence to orthography, as long as the public pronunciation pays the least attention to it; but when I find letters given up by the Publick, with respect to sound, I then consider them as ciphers: and, if my observation does not greatly fail me, I can assert, that our best speakers do not invariably pronounce the participial ing, so as to rhyme with sing, king, and ring. Indeed, a very obvious exception seems to offer itself in those verbs that end in these letters, as a repetition of the ringing sound in successive syllables would produce a Tautophony, (see the word,) and have a very bad effect on the ear; and therefore, instead of singing, bringing, and flinging, our best speakers are heard to pronounce sing-in, bring-in, and fling-in; and for the very same reason that we exclude the ringing sound in these words, we ought to admit it when the verb ends with in; for if, instead of sinning, pinning, and beginning, we should pronounce sin-nin, pin-nin, and begin-nin, we should fall into the same disgusting repetition as in the former case. The participial ing, therefore, ought always to have its ringing sound, except in those words formed from verbs in this termination; for writing, reading, and speaking, are certainly preferable to writin, readin, and speakin, wherever the pronunciation has the least degree of precision or solemnity.

411. N is mute when it ends a syllable, and is preceded by l or m, as kiln, hymn, linn, solemn, columm, autumn, condemn, contemn. In hym-ning, and lim-ning, the n is generally pronounced, and sometimes, in very solemn speaking, in condem-ning, and contem-ning; but in both cases, contrary to analogy, which forbids any sound in the participle that was not in the verb. (381.)

P.

412. This letter is mute before s and t at the beginning of words, as psalm, psalmist, psalmody, psalmo- graphy, psalter, psaltry; the prefix pseudo signifying false, as pseudography, pseudology, and the interjection pshaw! To these we may add, ptisan, ptyalism, ptysmagogue. It is mute in the middle of words between m and t, in empty, sempstress, peremptory, sumptuous, presumptuous, redemption, exemption, and raspberry. In cupboard it coalesces with and falls into its flat sound b, as if written cubboard. It is mute in a final syllable between the same letters, as tempt, attempt, contempt, exempt, prompt, account. In receipt it is mute between i and t, and in the military corps (a body of troops,) both p and s are mute, as custom has acquiesced in the French pronunciation of most military terms.

PH.

413. Ph is generally pronounced like f, as in philosophy, phantom, &c. In nephew and Stephen, it has the sound of v. In diphthong and triphthong the sound of p only is heard; and the h is mute likewise in naphtha, ophthalmic, &c. In apophthegm both letters are dropped. The same may be observed of phthisis, phthisick, and phthisical. In sapphire the first p slides into ph, by an accental coalition of similar letters, very agreeable to analogy. See Exaggerate.

Q.

414. Q has always the sound of k: it is constantly followed by u, pronounced like w; and its general sound is heard in quack, quill, queen, &c. pronounced kwack, kwill, kween, &c. That the u subjoined to this letter has really the power of w, may be observed in the generality of words where a succeeds; for we find the vowel go into the broad sound in quart, quarrel, quantity, &c. as much as in rear, warrant, vant, &c. (85.) But it must be carefully noted, that this broad sound is only heard under the accent; when the a, preceded by qu, is not accented, it has the sound of every other accented a in the language. (92.) Thus the a in quarter, quarrel, quadrant, &c. because it has the accent, is broad: the same may be observed when the accent is secondary only (522) (527,) as in quadragesimal, quadrissyllable, &c.; but when the accent is on the succeeding syllable, as in quadratick, qua-drangular, &c. the a goes into the obscure sound approaching to the Italian a. (92.)

415. As a great number of words, derived from the French, have these letters in them, according to our usual complaisance for that language, we adopt the French pronunciation: thus in coquet, doquet, etiquette, masquerade, harlequin, oblique, antique, opaque, pique, piquant, piquet, burlesque, grotesque, casque, mosque, quadrille, quater-cousin, the qu is pronounced like k. Quoif and quoit ought to be written and pronounced coif, coit. Paquet, laquey, chequer, and risque, have been very properly spelled by Johnson, as they are pronounced, packet, lackey, checker, and risk. Quoth ought to be pronounced with the u, as if written kwuth, and therefore is not irregular. Liquor and harlequin always lose the u; and conquer, conquerable, and conqueror, sometimes, particularly on the Stage. This deviation, however, seems not to have gone beyond recovery; and conquest is still regularly pronounced congkwest. Quote and quotation are perfectly regular, and ought never to be pronounced as some do, cote and cotation. Cirque, contracted from circus, and cinque, cinque-foif, cinque-ports, cinque-spotted, are pronounced sirk and sink; and critique, when we mean a criticism, to distinguish it from critick, is pronounced critteek, rhyming with speak. See Quoit and Quotation.

R.

416. This letter is never silent, but its sound is sometimes transposed. In a final unaccented syllable, terminating with re, the r is pronounced after the e, as acre, licre, sabre, fibre, ochre, meagre, maigre, sepulchre, theatre, spectre, metre, petre, mitre, nitre, antre, lustre, accoutre, massacre; to which we may add, centre, and sceptre; sometimes written center and scepter; but, in my opinion, very improperly, as this peculiarity is fixed, and easily understood; while reducing meagre to meager disturbs the rule, and adds another anomaly to our pronunciation, by making the g hard before e. (93.)

417. The same transposition of r is always perceived in the pronunciation of apron and iron; and often in that of citron and saffron, as if written apurn, turn, citurn, saffurn: nor do I think the two first can be pronounced otherwise without a disagreeable stiffness; but the two last may preserve the r before the vowel with great propriety. Children and hundred have slid into this analogy, when used colloquially, but preserve the r before the e in solemn speaking.

418. As this letter is but a jar of the tongue, sometimes against the roof of the mouth, and sometimes at the orifice of the throat, it is the most imperfect of all the consonants; and, as its formation is so indefinite, no wonder, when it is not under the accent, that the vowels which precede it should be so indefinite in their sounds, as we may perceive in the words friar, tier, elixir, nadir, mayor, martyr, which, with respect to sound, might be written, friur, tiur, elizur, nadur, mayur, martur. (98.) These inaccuracies in pronunciation, says an ingenious writer, we seem to have derived from our Saxon ancestors. Dr. Hicks observes in the first chapter of his Saxon Grammar, that "Comparativa apud eos (Anglo-Saxones) Indifferenter exeunt in ar, er, ir, or, ur, yr; et Superlativa in ast, est, ist, ost, ust, yst; participia præsens in ant, ant, end, ind, ond, und, ynd; præteriti vero in ad, ad, id, od, ud, yd; pro vario scilicet vel ævi vel loci dialecto." Upon various other occasions they also used two or more vowels and diphthongs indifferently; and this not always from difference of age or place, because these variations are frequently found in the same page. This will account for the difference between the spelling and pronunciation of such anomalous words as busy and bury, now pronounced as if written bisy and bery, (the i and e having their common short sound,) and formerly spelt indifferently with e, u, or y. Essay on the Harmony of Language. Robson, 1774.

419. There is a distinction in the sound of this letter, scarcely ever noticed by any of our writers on the subject, which is, in my opinion, of no small importance; and that is, the rough and smooth r. Ben Jonson, in his Grammar, says it is sounded firm in the beginning of words, and more liquid in the middle and ends, as in rarer, riper; and so in the Latin. The rough r is formed by jarring the tip of the tongue against the roof of the mouth near the fore teeth: the smooth r is a vibration of the lower part of the tongue, near the root, against the inward region of the palate, near the entrance of the throat. This latter r is that which marks the pronunciation of England, and the former that of Ireland. In England, and particularly in London, the r in lard, bard, card, regard, &c. is pronounced so much in the throat as to be little more than the middle or Italian a, lengthened into laad, baad, caad, regaad; while in Ireland the r, in these words, is pronounced with so strong a jar of the tongue against the fore part of the palate, and accompanied with such an aspiration or strong breathing at the beginning of the letter, as to produce that harshness we call the Irish accent. But if this letter is too forcibly pronounced in Ireland, it is often too feebly sounded in England, and particularly in London, where it is sometimes entirely sunk; and it may perhaps be worthy of observation, that provided we avoid a too forcible pronunciation of the r, when it ends a word, or is followed by a consonant in the same syllable, we may give as much force as we please to this letter at the beginning of a word, without producing any harshness to the ear: thus Rome, river, rage, may have the r as forcible as in Ireland; but bar, bard, card, hard, &c. must have it nearly as soft as in London.

S.

420. As the former letter was a jar, this is a hiss; but a hiss which forms a much more definite and complete consonant than the other. This consonant, like the other mutes, has a sharp and a flat sound; the sharp sound is heard in the name of the letter, and in the words same, sin, this; the flat sound is that of z, heard in is, his, was: and these two sounds, accompanied by the aspirate, or h, form all the varieties found under this letter. (41.)

421. S has always its sharp hissing sound at the beginning of words, as soon, sin, &c. and when it immediately follows any of the sharp mutes, f, k, p, t, as scoffs, blocks, hips, pits, or when it is added to the mute e after any of these letters, as strifes, flakes, pipes, miles.

422. S is sharp and hissing at the end of the monosyllables yes, this, us, thus, gas; and at the end of words of two or more syllables, if it be preceded by any of the vowels but e, and forms a distinct syllable: thus es in pipes and miles do not form a distinct syllable; and as they are preceded by a sharp mute, the s is sharp likewise: but in prices these letters form a syllable, and the s is pronounced like z, according to the general rule.

423. The only exceptions to this rule, are the words, as, whereas, has, his, was; for bias, dowlas, Atlas, me tropolis, basis, chaos, tripos, pus, chorus, cyprus, &c. have the final s pronounced sharp and hissing.

424. Agreeably to this rule, the numerous terminations in ous, as pious, superfluous, &c. have the s sharp, and are pronounced exactly like the pronoun us: and every double s in the language is pronounced in the same manner, except in the words dissolve, possess, and their compounds, scissors, hussy, and hussar.

425. S, in the inseparable preposition dis, when either the primary or secondary accent is on it, (522,) is always pronounced sharp and hissing: the word dismal, which seems to be an exception, is not so in reality; for, in this word, dis is not a preposition: thus dissolute, dissonant, &c. with the primary accent on dis, and disability, disagree, &c. with the secondary accent on the same letters, have the s sharp and hissing; but when the accent is on the second syllable, the s is either sharp or flat, as it is followed either by a vowel, or a sharp or flat consonant; thus disable, disaster, disease, disinterested, dishonest, disorder, disuse, have all of them the s in dis flat like z, because the accent is not on it, and a vowel begins the next syllable; but discredit, disfigure, diskindness, dispense, distaste, have the s sharp and hissing, because a sharp consonant begins the succeeding accented syllable; and disband, disdain, disgrace, disjoin, disvalue, have the s flat like z, because they are succeeded by a flat consonant in the same situation. (435.)

426. S, in the inseparable preposition mis, is always sharp and hissing, whether the accent be on it or not; or whether it be followed either by a vowel or a sharp or flat consonant, as miscreant, misaim, misappily, misorder, misuse, misbegot, misdeem, misgovern, &c. See the prefix Mis.

427. S, followed by e in the final syllable of adjectives, is always sharp and hissing, as base, obese, precise, concise, globeus, verbose, morbose, pulcose, tenebriose, corticose, jocosse, oleose, rugose, desidiouse, close, siliculose, calculeose, tumulose, animose, venenose, arenose, siliginose, crinose, loose, operose, morose, edematose, comatose, acetose, aqueose, siliquose, actuose, diffuse, profuse, occluse, recluse, abstruse, obtuse, except wise and otherwise, and the pronominal adjectives these and those.

429. S, in the adjectives ending in usory, is always sharp and hissing, as suasory, persuasory, decisory, derisory, delusory, &c.

430. The same s may be observed of s in the adjectives ending in some, as troublesome, &c. and substantives in osity, as generosity, &c.

431. Se, preceded by the liquids l, n, or r, has the s sharp and hissing, as pulse, appulse, dense, tense, intense, sense, verse, adverse, &c. except cleansse.

S pronounced like z.

432. S has always its flat buzzing sound, as it may be called, when it immediately follows any of the flat mutes b, d, g hard, or v, as rills, heads, rags, sieves. (24.)

433. S is pronounced like z, when it forms an additional syllable with e before it, in the plurals of nouns, and the third person singular of verbs; even though the singulars and the first persons end in sharp hissing sounds, as asses, riches, cages, boxes, &c.: thus prices and prizes have both the final s flat, though the preceding mute in the first word is sharp. (422.)

434. As s is hissing, when preceded by a liquid, and followed by e mute, as trance, tense, &c.; so when it follows any of the liquids without the e, it is pronounced like z, as morals, means, seems, hers. In the same analogy, when s comes before any of the liquids, it has the sound of z, as cosmetic, dismal, pismire, chasm, prism, theism, schism, and all polysyllables ending in asm, ism, osm, or ysm, as enthusiasm, judasism, microcosm, paroxysm, &c.

435. S, in the preposition dis, is either sharp or flat, as it is accented or unaccented, as explained above; but it ought always to be pronounced like z, when it is not under the accent, and is followed by a flat mute, a liquid, or a vowel, as disable, disease, disorder, disuse, disband, disdain, disgrace, disvalue, disjoin, dislike, dislodge, dismay, dismember, dismount, dismiss, disnatured, disrank, disrelish, disrobe. (425.) Mr. Sheridan, and those orthoepists who have copied him seem to have totally overlooked this tendency in the liquids to convert the s to z when this letter ends the first syllable without the accent, and the liquids begin the second syllable with it.

436. S is pronounced like z, in the monosyllables as, is, was, these, those, and in all plurals whose singulars end in a vowel, or a vowel followed by e mute, as commas, operas, shoes, aloes, dues, and consequently when it follows the w or y, in the plurals of nouns, or the third persons singular of verbs, as vays, betrays, news, views, &c.

437. Some verbs ending in se have the s like z, to distinguish them from nouns or adjectives of the same form.

438. Sy and sey, at the end of words, have the s pronounced like z, if it has a vowel before it, with the accent on it, as easy, greasy, queasy, cheesy, daisy, misy, rosy, causey, noisy; but if the accent is on the antepenultimate syllable, the s is sharp, as heresy, poesy, &c. if a sharp mute precede, the s is sharp, as tricksy, tipsy; if a liquid precede, and the accent is on the penultimate syllable, the s is flat, as palsy, flimsy, clumsy, pansy, tansy, phrensy, quinsy, tolsey, whimsey, malmsey, jersey, kersey. Pursy has the s sharp and hissing from its relation to purse, and minstrelsy and controversy have the antepenultimate and preantepenultimate accent: thus we see why busy, bousy, lousy, and drousy, have the s like z, and jealousy the sharp hissing s.

439. S, in the termination sible, when preceded by a vowel, is pronounced like z, as persuasive, risible, visible, divisible, infusible, conclusible; but if a liquid consonant precede the s, the s then becomes sharp and hissing, as sensible, responsible, tensible, reversible, &c.

440. S, in the terminations sary and sory, is sharp and hissing, as dispensary, adversary, suatory, persuasory, decisory, incisory, derisory, depulsory, compulsory, incensory, compensory, suspensory, sensory, responsory, cursory, discursory, lussory, elusory, delusory, illusory, collusory. Rosary and misery, which have the s like z, are the only exceptions.

441. S, in the termination ise, is pronounced like z, except in the adjectives before mentioned, and a few substantives, such as paradise, anise, rise, grise, verdigrise, mortise, travise.

442. S, in the terminations sal and sel, when preceded by a vowel, is pronounced like z, as nasal, oscel, housel, nouzel, reprisal, proposal, refusal, and sharp and hissing when preceded by a consonant, as men-sal, universal, &c.

443. S, in the terminations son, sen, and sin, is pronounced like z, as reason, season, treason, cargason, diapason, orison, denison, venison, denison, foison, poison, prison, damson, crimson, chosen, resin, rosin, raisin, cousin. But the s in mason, basin, garrison, caparison, comparison, parson, and person, is sharp and hissing. (170.)

444. S, after the inseparable prepositions pre and pro, is sharp, as in presage, preside, presidential, pre-sence, presension, prosecute, prosecution, prosody, propo-peia, but flat like z in presence, president, presidency, presume, presumptive, presumption; but where the pre is prefixed to a word which is significant when alone, the s is always sharp, as pre-suppose, pre-surmise, &c.

445. S, after the inseparable preposition re, is almost always pronounced like z, as resemble, resent, resentment, reserve, reservation, reservoir, residue, residet, residuary, reside, resign, resignation, re-signation, resilience, resiliency, resiliation, resin, resist, resistance, resolve, resolution, resolute, result, resume, resumption, resurrection.

446. S is sharp after re in resuscitation, respiration, &c. and when the word added to it is significant by itself, as research, reseize, reseal, resurvey. Thus to resign, with the s like z, signifies to yield up; but to re-sign, to sign again, has the s sharp as in sign: so to resound, to reverberate, has the s like z; but to re-sound, to sound again, has the s sharp and hissing.

447. Thus we see, after pursuing this letter through all its combinations, how difficult it often is to decide by analogy, when we are to pronounce it sharp and hissing, and when flat like z. In many cases it is of no great importance: in others it is the distinctive mark of a vulgar or a polite pronunciation. Thus design is never heard with the s like z but among the lowest order of the people; and yet there is not the least reason from analogy why we should not pronounce it in this manner, as well as in resign: the same may be observed of preside and desist, which have the s sharp and hissing; and reside and resist, where the same letter is pronounced like z. It may, however, be remarked, that re has the s like z after it more regularly than any other of the prefixes.

448. It may, perhaps, be worthy of observation, that though s becomes sharp or flat, as it is followed by a sharp or flat consonant, or a liquid, as cosmetick, dismal, disband, disturb, &c. yet if it follows a liquid or a flat consonant, except in the same syllable, it is generally sharp. Thus the s in tubs, suds, &c. is like z; but in subserve, subside, subsist, it is sharp and hissing: and though it is flat in absolve, it is sharp in absolute and absolution; but if a sharp consonant precede, the s is always sharp and hissing, as tipsy, tricksy: thus in the pronunciation of the word Glasgow, as the s is always sharp and hissing, we find the g invariably slide into its sharp sound k; and this word is always heard as if written Glas-kov. We see, therefore, that a preceding sharp consonant makes the succeeding s sharp, but not inversely.

449. S is always sharp and hissing when followed by c, except in the word discern.

S aspirated, or sounding like sh, or zh.

450. S, like its fellow dental t, becomes aspirated, and goes either into the sharp sound sh, or the flat sound zh, when the accent is on the preceding vowel, and it is followed by a semi-consonant diphthong, as nauseate, or a diphthongal vowel, as pleasure, pronounced nausheate and plethure. (195.)

451. S, in the termination sion, preceded by a vowel, goes into the flat aspiration zh, as evasion, cohesion, decision, confusion, pronounced evashion, &c.; but when it is preceded by a liquid or another s, it has the sharp aspiration sh, as expulsion, dimension, reversion, pronounced expushion, &c.

452. The same may be observed of s before u; when a vowel precedes the s, with the accent on it, the s goes into the flat aspiration, as pleasure, measure, treasure, rasure, pronounced plethure, &c.; but when preceded by a liquid, or another s, it is sounded sh, as sensual, censure, tensure, pressure, pronounced sensual, censure, &c.

453. From the clearness of this analogy, we may perceive the impropriety of pronouncing Asia with the sharp aspiration, as if written Asiah; when, by the foregoing rule, it ought undoubtedly to be pronounced Asiah, rhyming with Aprasia, euthanasia, &c. with the flat aspiration of z. This is the Scotch pronunciation of this word, and unquestionably the true one: but if I mistake not, Persia is pronounced in Scotland with the same aspiration of s, and as if written Perzhia; which is as contrary to analogy as the other is agreeable to it.

454. The tendency of the s to aspiration before a diphthongal sound has produced several anomalies in the language, which can only be detected by recurring to first principles: for which purpose it may be necessary to observe, that the accent or stress naturally preserves the letters in their true sound; and as feebleness naturally succeeds force, so the letters, immediately after the stress, have a tendency to slide into different sounds, which require less exertion of the organs. Hence the omission of one of the vowels in the pronunciation of the last syllable of fountain, mountain, captain, &c. (208): hence the short sound of i in respite, scville, &c. hence the s pronounced like z in disable, where the accent is on the second syllable; and like s sharp and hissing, in disability, where there is a secondary stress on the first syllable; and hence the difference between the z in exercise, and that in exert; the former having the accent on it, being pronounced eks, as if the word were written ekercise; and the latter without the accent, pronounced gz, as if the word were written egzert. This analogy leads us immediately to discover the irregularity of sure, sugar, and their compounds, which are pronounced shure and chugar, though the accent is on the first syllable, and ought to preserve the s without aspiration; and a want of attending to this analogy has betrayed Mr. Sheridan into a series of mistakes in the sound of s in the words suicide, presume, resume, &c. as if written shoicide, pre-zhoom, re-zhoom, &c. but if this is the true pronunciation of these words, it may be asked, why are not suit, suitable, pursue, &c. to be pronounced shoot, shoot-able, pur-shoot? If it be answered, Custom; I own this decides the question at once. Let us only be assured, that the best speakers pronounce c like o, and that is the true pronunciation: but those who see analogy so openly violated, ought to be assured of the certainty of the custom before they break through all the laws of language to conform to it. (69) (71.) See Superable.

455. We have seen, in a great variety of instances, the versatility of s, how frequently it slides into the sound of z; but my observation greatly fails me if it ever takes the aspiration, unless it immediately follows the accent, except in the words sure, sugar, and their compounds; and these irregularities are sufficient, without adding to the numerous catalogue we have already seen under this letter.

456. The analogy we have just been observing directs us in the pronunciation of usury, usurer, and usurious. The two first have the accent on the first syllable, which permits the s to go into aspiration, as if the words were written ushury, and ushurer; but the accent being on the second u in the last word, the s is prevented from going into aspiration, and is pronounced usurious. (479) (480).

457. Though the ss in passion, mission, &c. belong to separate syllables, as if spelled pas-sion, mis-sion, &c. yet the accent presses the first into the same aspiration as the last, and they are both pronounced with the sharp aspirated hiss, as if they were but one s. See Exaggerate.

458. S is silent in isle, island, aisle, demesne, puisne, viscount, and at the end of some words from the French, as pas, sous, vis-a-vis; and in corps the two last letters are silent, and the word pronounced care. (412.)

459. T is the sharp sound of D, (41); but though the latter is often changed into the former, the former never goes into the latter. The sound to which this letter is extremely prone is that of s. This sound of t has greatly multiplied the hissing in our own language, and has not a little promoted it in most modern tongues. That p and b, t and d, k and g, hard, s and z, should slide into each other, is not surprising, as they are distinguished only by a nice shade of sound; but that t should alter to s seems a most violent transition, till we consider the organic formation of these letters, and of those vowels which always occasion it. If we attend to the formation of t, we shall find that it is a stoppage of the breath by the application of the upper part of the tongue near the end, to the correspondent part of the palate, and that if we just detach the tongue from the palate, sufficiently to let the breath pass, a hiss is produced which forms the letter s. Now the vowel that occasions this transition of t to s is the squeezed sound of e, as heard in y consonant, (8); which squeezed sound is a species of hiss; and this hiss, from the absence of accent, easily slides into s, and s as easily into sh: thus mechanically is generated that hissing termination tion, which forms but one syllable, as if written shun. (195.)

460. But it must be carefully remarked, that this hissing sound, contracted by the t before certain diphthongs, is never heard but after the accent: when the accent falls on the vowel immediately after the t, this letter, like s or c in the same situation, preserves its simple sound: thus the c in social goes into sh, because the accent is on the preceding vowel; but it preserves the simple sound of s in society, because the accent is on the succeeding vowel. The same analogy is obvious in satiated and satiety; and is perfectly agreeable to that difference made by accent in the sound of other letters. (71.) See Satiety.

461. As the diphthongs ia, ie, io, or iu, when coming after the accent, have the power of drawing the t into sh, so the diphthongal vowel u, in the same situation, has a similar power. If we analyze the u, we shall find it commence with the squeezed sound of e, equivalent to the consonant y, (39). This letter produces the small hiss before taken notice of, (459); and which may be observed in the pronunciation of nature, and borders so closely on natshur, that it is no wonder Mr. Sheridan adopted this latter mode of spelling the word to express its sound. The only fault of Mr. Sheridan in depicting the sound of this word, seems to be that of making the u short, as in bur, cur, &c. as every correct ear must perceive an elegance in lengthening the sound of the u, and a vulgarity in shortening it. The true pronunciation seems to lie between both.

462. But Mr. Sheridan's greatest fault seems to lie in not attending to the nature and influence of the accent; and because nature, creature, feature, fortune, misfortune, &c. have the t pronounced like ch, or tsh, as if written crea-chure, fea-tshure, &c. he has extended this change of t into tch, or tsh to the word tune, and its compounds, tutor, tutress, tutorage, tu- telage, tutelar, tutalary, &c. tumult, tumour, &c. which he spells tshoon, tshoon-elle, &c. tshoo-tur, tshoo-triss, tshoo-tur-idzh, tshoo-tel-idzh, tshoo-tel-er tshoo-tel-er-y, &c. tshoo-mult, tshoo-mar, &c. Though it is evident, from the foregoing observations, that as the u is under the accent, the preceding t is preserved pure, and that the words ought to be pronounced as if written tutor, tewmult, tewmour, &c. and neither tshootur, tshoomult, tshoomour, as Mr. Sheridan writes them, nor tootur, toomult, toomour, as they are often pronounced by vulgar speakers. See Superable.

463. Here, then, the line is drawn by analogy. Whenever t comes before these vowels, and the accent immediately follows it, the t preserves its simple sound, as in Miltiades, elephantiasis, satiety, &c.; but when the accent precedes the t, it then goes into sh, tch, or tsh, as na-tshure or na-tchura, na-shion, vir-tshue or vir-tshue, patient, &c. or nashion, pashtent, &c. (464.) In similar circumstances, the same may be observed of d, as arduous, hideous, &c. (293), (294), (376). Nor is this tendency of t before long u found only when the accent immediately precedes; for we hear the same aspiration of this letter in spiritual, spirituous, signature, ligature, forfeiture, as if written spiritchual, spiritchuous, signatshure, ligatshure, forfeitshure, &c. where the accent is two syllables before these letters; and the only termination which seems to refuse this tendency of the t to aspiration is that in tude, as latitude, longitude, multitude, &c.

464. This pronunciation of t extends to every word where the diphthong or diphthongal sound commences with i or e, except in the terminations of verbs and adjectives, which preserve the simple in the augment, without suffering the t to go into the hissing sound, as I pity, thou pitiest, he pities, or pitied, mightier, worthier, twentieth, thirtieth, &c. This is agreeable to the general rule, which forbids the adjectives or verbal terminations to alter the sound of the primitive verb or noun. See No. 381. But in the words bestial, celestial, frontier, admission, &c. where the s, x, or n precedes the t, this letter is pronounced like tch, or tsh, instead of sh, (291), as best-tchial, celes-tchial, front-tcheer, admix-tchion, &c.: as also when the t is followed by eu, whatever letter precede, as righteous, pitious, plenteous, &c. pronounced right-cheous, pit-cheous, plen-cheous, &c. The same may be observed of t when succeeded by uou, as unctuous, presumptuous, &c. pronounced ung-tchuou, presump-tchuou, &c. See the words.

TH.

465. This lisping sound, as it may be called, is almost peculiar to the English. (41), (50), (469). The Greek Θ was certainly not the sound we give it: like its principal letter, it has a sharp and a flat sound; but these are so little subject to rule, that a catalogue will, perhaps, be the best guide.

466. Th, at the beginning of words, is sharp, as in thank, think, &c. except in the following words: This, that, than, the, thee, their, them, then, thence, there, these, they, thine, thither, those, thou, though, thus, thy, and their compounds.

467. Th, at the end of words, is sharp, as death, breath, &c. except in beneath, booth, with; and the verbs to wreath, to loath, to unloath, to seeth, to smooth, to sooth, to moult: all which ought to be written with the e final; not only to distinguish some of them from the nouns, but to show that th is soft; for though th, when final, is sometimes pronounced soft, as in loath, to moult, &c. yet th at the end of words is never pronounced hard. There is as obvious an analogy for this sound of the th in these verbs, as for the z sound of s in verbs ending in se (437); and why we should write some verbs with e, and others without it, is inconceivable. The best way to show the absurdity of our orthography in this particular, will be to draw out the nouns and verbs as they stand in Johnson's Dictionary.

Surely nothing can be more evident than the analogy of the language in this case. Is it not absurd to hesitate a moment at writing all the verbs with the e final? This is a departure from our great lexicographer, which he himself would approve, as nothing but inadvertency could have led him into this unmeaning irregularity.—It may not be improper to observe here, that those substantives which in the singular end with th sharp adopt the th flat in the plural, as path, paths; bath, baths, &c. Such a propensity is there to slide into the flat sound of s, that we frequently hear this sound in the genitive case, as My wife's portion, for my wife's portion. In the same manner we hear of paying so much for house-rent and taxes, instead of house-rent and taxes; and shopkeepers tell us they have goods of all prices, instead of all prices. Nay, some go so far as to pronounce the plural of truth, truths; but this must be carefully avoided.

468. T is hard in the middle of words, either when it precedes or follows a consonant, as panther, nepenthe, orthodox, orthography, orthoepy, thwart, athwart, ethnical, misanthrope, philanthropy, &c. except brethren, farthings, farther, northern, worthy, burthen, murder, where the th is flat; but the two last words are better written burden and murder.

469. Th between two vowels is generally soft in words purely English, as father, feather, heather, higher, thither, whether, whether, either, neither, weather, wether, wither, gather, together, pother, mother.

470. Th between two vowels, in words from the learned languages, is generally hard, as apathy, sympathy, antipathy, Athens, atheist, authentic, author, authority, athirst, cathartic, cathedral, catholic, catheter, ether, ethnicks, lethargy, Lethé, Leviathan, litharge, lithotomy, mathesis, mathematics, method, pathetick, plethora, polymathy, prothonotary, anathema, amethyst, theatre, amphitheatre, apothecary, apotheosis.

471. Th is sometimes pronounced like simple t, as Thomas, thyme, Thames, asthma, phthisis, phthisick, phthisical, and is silent in twelfthtide, pronounced twelfth-tide.

T silent.

472. T is silent when preceded by s, and followed by the abbreviated terminations en and ic, as hasten, chasten, fasten, listen, glisten, christen, moisten, which are pronounced as if written hacen, chacen, &c.; in bursten the t is heard; so castle, nestle, trestle, wrestle, thistle, whistle, epistle, bristle, gristle, jostle, apostle, throstle, bustle, juggle, rustle, are pronounced as if written castle, nestle, &c.; in pestle, the t is pronounced; in often, fasten, and soften, the t is silent, and at the end of several words from the French, as trait, gout, (taste,) éclat. In the first of these words the t begins to be pronounced; in the last, it has been sometimes heard; but in the second, never. Toupet is more frequently written toupee, and is therefore not irregular. In billet-doux the t is silent, as well as in haubty. The same silence of t may be observed in the English words, Christmas, chestnut, mortgage, ostler, bankruptcy, and in the second syllable of mistletoe. In current and currants the t is always mute. See Nos. 102, 103, 405.

V.

473. V is flat f, and bears the same relation to it as b does to p, d to t, hard g to k, and z to s (41.) It is never irregular; and if ever silent, it is in the word twelvemonth, where both that letter and the e, are, in colloquial pronunciation, generally dropped, as if written twel'month.

W initial.

474. That w at the beginning of a word is a consonant, has been proved already (9) (59.) It is always silent before r, as in wrack, wrangle, wrap, wrath, wreak, wreath, wreck, wren, wrench, wrest, wrestle, wretch, wriggle, wright, wring, wrinkle, wrist, writhe, writh, wrong, wrought, wry, awry, bewray, and before h and the vowel o, when long, as whole, who, &c. pronounced hole, hoo, &c.

475. W before h is pronounced as if it were after the h, as hoo-y, why, hoo-en, when, &c.; but in whole, whoop, &c. the single and double o coalescing with the same sound in w, this last letter is scarcely perceptible. In sworn, however, this letter is always heard; and pronouncing it soon is vulgar. In sword and answer it is always silent. In two j mingles with its kindred sound, and the number two is pronounced like the adverb too. In the prepositions toward and towards the w is dropped, as if written toard and toards, rhyming with hoard and hoards; but in the adjectives and adverbs toward and towards, froward and frowards, the w is heard distinctly. It is sometimes dropped in the last syllable of awkward, as if written aw kard; but this pronunciation is vulgar.

X.

476. X is a letter composed of those which have been already considered, and therefore will need but little discussion. (48) (51.) It is flat or sharp like its component letters, and is subject to the same laws.

477. X has a sharp sound like ks, when it ends a syllable with the accent upon it, as exercise, excellence, &c. or when the accent is on the next syllable, if it begin with a consonant, as excuse, expense, &c. (71.)

478. X has its flat sound like gs, when the accent is not on it, and the following syllable having the accent begins with a vowel, as exert, example, exist, &c. pronounced egert, egzample, egzist, &c. The same sound may be observed if h follow, as in exhibit, exhale, &c. pronounced eghibit, egzhale; but if the secondary accent be on the x, as in the polysyllable exhibition, exhalation, &c. this letter is then sharp, as in exercise (71.) but in compound words where the primitive ends in x, this letter retains its primitive sound, as fixation, taxation, vexation, vexations, relaxation, &c.; to which we may add the simples in our language, dorology and proximity; so that this propensity of x to become egz, seems confined to the inseparable preposition.

479. X, like s, is aspirated, or takes the sound of h after it, only when the accent is before it. Hence the difference between luxury and luxurious; anxious and anxiety: in the true pronunciation of which words, nothing will direct us but recurring to first principles. It was observed that s is never aspirated, or pronounced like sh, but when the accent is on the preceding syllable (450;) and that when the accent is on the succeeding vowel, though the s frequently is pronounced like z, it is never sounded zh: from which premises we may conclude, that luxury and luxurious, ought to be pronounced luckshury and lugzurious, and not lug-zh-ryus, as Mr. Sheridan spells it. The same error runs through his pronunciation of all the compounds, luxuriance, luxuriant, luxuriate, &c. which unquestionably ought to be pronounced lug-zu-ri-ance, lug-zu-ri-ant, lug-zu-ri-ate, &c. in four syllables, and not in three only, as they are divided in his Dictionary.

480. The same principles will lead us to decide in the words anxious and anxiety: as the accent is before the x in the first word, it is naturally divided into ank-sious, and as naturally pronounced ank-shus; but as the accent is after the x in the second word, and the hissing sound cannot be aspirated (456,) it must necessarily be pronounced ang-ziety. But Mr. Sheridan, without any regard to the component letters of these words, or the different position of the accent, has not only spelled them without aspiration, but without letting the s, in the composition of the last word, go into z; for thus they stand in his Dictionary: ank-syus, ank-si-ety. (456.)

481. The letter x, at the beginning of words, goes into z, as Xerxes, Xenophon, &c. pronounced Zerkses, Zenophon, &c.; it is silent at the end of the French billet-doux, and pronounced like s in beaux; often and better written beaus.

Y initial.

482. Y, as a consonant, has always the same sound; and this has been sufficiently described in ascertaining its real character (40); when it is a vowel at the end of a word or syllable with the accent upon it, it is sounded exactly like the first sound of i, as cy-der, ty-rant, re-ply, &c.; but at the end of a word or syllable, without the accent, it is pronounced like the first sound of e as liberty, fury, tenderly, &c.

Z.

483. Z is the flat s, and bears the same relation to it as b does to p, d to t, hard g to k, and v to f. Its common name is izzard, which Dr. Johnson explains into s hard; if, however, this be the meaning, it is a gross misnomer: for the z is not the hard, but the soft s;* but as it has a less sharp, and therefore not so audible a sound, it is not impossible but it may mean s surd. Zed, borrowed from the French, is the more fashionable name of this letter; but, in my opinion, not to be admitted, because the names of the letters ought to have no diversity.

484. Z, like s, goes into aspiration before a diphthong, or a diphthongal vowel after the accent, as is heard in vizier, glazier, grazier, &c. pronounced vizh-i-er, glazh-

* Professor Ward, speaking of the reason for doubling the s at the end of words, says, "s doubled retains its proper force, which, when single at the end of words, is softened into z, as his, hiss." And Dr. Wallis tells us, that it is almost certain when a noun has s hard in the last syllable, and becomes a verb, that in the latter case the s becomes soft, as a house is pronounced with the hard s, and to house with the s soft.

er, grek-1-er, &c. The same may be observed of azure, razure &c.

485. Z is silent in the French word tendevous; and is pronounced in the Italian manner, as if t were before it, in mezzotinto, as if written mettointo.

Thus have we endeavoured to exhibit a just idea of the principles of pronunciation, both with respect to single letters, and their various combinations into syllables and words. The attentive reader must have observed how much the sounds of the letters vary, as they are differently associated, and how much the pronunciation of these associations depends upon the position of the accent. This is a point of the utmost importance, and a want of attending to it has betrayed several ingenious men into the grossest absurdities. This will more fully appear in the observations on accent, which is the next point to be considered.

OF THE NATURE OF ACCENT.

486. The accent of the ancients is the opprobrium of modern criticism. Nothing can show more evidently the fallibility of the human faculties than the total ignorance we are in at present of the nature of the Latin and Greek accent.* This would be still more surprising if a phenomenon of a similar kind did not daily present itself to our view. The accent of the English language, which is constantly sounding in our ears, and every moment open to investigation, seems as much a mystery as that accent which is removed almost two thousand years from our view. Obscurity, perplexity, and confusion, run through every treatise on the subject, and nothing could be so hopeless as an attempt to explain it, did not a circumstance present itself, which at once accounts for the confusion, and affords a clue to lead us out of it.

487. Not one writer on accent has given us such a definition of the voice as acquaints us with its essential properties: they speak of high and low, loud and soft, quick and slow, but they never once mention that striking property which distinguishes speaking from singing sounds, and which, from its sliding from high to low, and from low to high, may not improperly be called the inflection of the voice. No wonder, when writers left this out of the account, that they should blunder about the nature of accent; it was impossible they should do otherwise; so partial an idea of the speaking voice must necessarily lead them into error. But let us once divide the voice into its rising and falling inflections, the obscurity vanishes, and accent becomes as intelligible as any other part of language.

488. Keeping this distinction in view, let us compare the accented syllable with others, and we shall find this general conclusion may be drawn: "The accented syllable is always louder than the rest: but when it has the rising inflection, it is higher than the preceding, and lower than the succeeding syllable; and when it has the falling inflection, it is pronounced higher as well as louder than the other syllables, either preceding or succeeding." The only exception to this rule is: "When the accent is on the last syllable of a word which has no emphasis, and which is the concluding word of a discourse." Those who wish to see this clearly demonstrated, may consult Elements of Elocution, second edition, page 181. On the present occasion it will be sufficient to observe, that the stress we call accent is as well understood as is necessary for the pronunciation of single words, which is the object of this treatise; and therefore, considering accent merely as stress, we shall proceed to make some remarks on its proper position in a word, and endeavour to detect some errors in the use and application of it.

The different Positions of the English Accent.

489. Accent, in its very nature, implies a comparison with other syllables less forcible; hence we may conclude that monosyllables, properly speaking, have no accent: when they are combined with other monosyllables and form a phrase, the stress which is laid upon one, in preference to others, is called emphasis. As emphasis evidently points out the most significant word in a sentence, so, where other reasons do not forbid, the accent always dwells with greatest force on that part of the word which, from its importance, the hearer has always the greatest occasion to observe: and this is necessarily the root, or body of the word. But as harmony of termination frequently attracts the accent from the root to the branches of words, so the first and most natural law of accentuation seems to operate less in fixing the stress than any of the other. Our own Saxon terminations, indeed, with perfect uniformity, leave the principal part of the word in quiet possession of what seems its lawful property (501.); but Latin and Greek terminations, of which our language is full, assume a right of preserving their original accent, and subjecting many of the words they bestow upon us, to their own classical laws.

490. Accent, therefore, seems to be regulated, in a great measure, by etymology. In words from the Saxon, the accent is generally on the root; in words from the learned languages, it is generally on the termination; and if to these we add the different accent we lay on some words, to distinguish them from others, we seem to have the three great principles of accentuation; namely, the radical, the terminational, and the distinctive.

Accent on Dissyllables.

491. Every word of two syllables has necessarily one of them accented, and but one. It is true, for the sake of emphasis, we sometimes lay an equal stress upon two successive syllables, as di-rect, some-times; but when these words are pronounced alone, they have never more than one accent. For want of attending to this distinction, some writers have roundly asserted, that many dissyllables have two accents, such as concoy, concourse, discord, skipperck: in which, and similar instances, they confound the distinctness, with which the latter syllables are necessarily pronounced, with accentual force; though nothing can be more different. Let us pronounce the last syllable of the noun torment as distinctly as we please: it will still be very different with respect to force from the same syllable in the verb to torment, where the accent is on it; and if we do but carefully watch our pronunciation, the same difference will appear in every word of two syllables throughout the language. The word Amén is the only word which is pronounced with two consecutive accents when alone.

492. There is a peculiarity of accentuation in certain words of two syllables, which are both nouns and verbs, that is not unworthy of notice; the nouns having the accent on the first syllable, and the verbs on the last. This seems an instinctive effort in the language (if the expression will be allowed me) to compensate in some measure for the want of different terminations for these different parts of speech.* The words which admit of this diversity of accent, are the following:

| Nouns. | Verbs. | Nouns. | Verbs. |

493. To this analogy, some speakers are endeavouring to reduce the word contents; which, when it signifies the matter contained in a book, is often heard with the accent on the first syllable: but though this pronunciation serves to distinguish words which are different in signification, and to give, in some measure, a difference of form to the

* See Observations on the Greek and Latin Accent and Quantity, at the end of the Key to the Classical Pronunciation of Greek, Latin, and Scripture Proper Names.

* It is not improbable that the verb, by receiving a participial termination, has inclined us to pronounce that part of speech with an accent nearer the end than we do the noun: for though we can without any difficulty pronounce the verb with the accent on the noun, we cannot so easily pronounce the participle and the adverb formed from it with that accent: thus we can pronounce transport with the accent on the first syllable; but not so easily transporting and transportingly. This is a solid reason for the distinction, and ought to induce us where we can to observe it. A sépulchre and to sépulchre seem to require it. See the word.

noun and verb, in which our tongue is remarkably deficient, still it is doubtful whether this distinction be of any real advantage to the language. See Bowl. This diversity of accentuation seems to have place in some compound verbs. See Counterbalance and the subsequent words.

494. Sometimes words have a different accent, as they are adjectives or substantives.

| Substantives. | Adjectives. |
|----------------------------|---------------------------|
| áugust , the month | avgúst , noble |
| cómpact | compáct |
| chámptaign , wine | chámpaign , open |
| éxile , banishment | exile , small |
| gállánt , a lover | gállánt , bold |
| instínet | instánet |
| ínvalíd | invalíd |
| Lévánt , a place | levánt , eastern |
| minúte , of time | minúte , small |
| súpine , in grammar | súpine , indolent. |

495. Sometimes the same parts of speech have a different accent to mark a difference of signification.

|--|
| to cójure , to practise magic; to conjure , to entreat |
| désert , a wilderness |
| búffel , a blow |
| sínister , insidious |
| désert , merit |
| buffét , a cupboard |
| sínister , the left side. |

496. In this analogy some speakers pronounce the word Concordance with the accent on the first syllable, when it signifies a dictionary of the Bible; and with the accent on the second, when it signifies agreement: but besides that, there is not the same reason for distinguishing nouns from each other, as there is nouns from verbs; the accent on the first syllable of the word Concordance gives a harshness and poverty to its sound, which ought to be avoided.

497. But though the different accentuation of nouns and verbs of the same form does not extend so far as might be expected, it is certain, that in words of two syllables, where the noun and verb are of different forms, there is an evident tendency in the language to place the accent upon the first syllable of the noun, and on the last of the verb. Hence the nouns outrage, upstart, and uproar, have the accent on the first syllable; and the verbs to uplift, to uphold, and to outstrip, on the last.

498. This analogy will appear still more evident if we attend to the accent of those nouns and verbs which are compounded of two words. Every dissyllable compounded of words which, taken separately, have a meaning, may be deemed a qualified substantive; and that word which qualifies or describes the other, is that which most distinguishes it, and consequently is that which ought to have the accent: accordingly we find that inkhorn, outrage, chairman, freshhold, sand-box, book-case, pen-knife, have the accent on the first syllable, which is the specifying part of the word; while gainsay, foresee, overlook, undersell, have the accent on the last syllable, which is the least distinguishing part of the word. This rule, however, is, either by the caprice of custom, or the love of harmony, frequently violated, but is sufficiently extensive to mark the general tendency of the language. Akeaside brings the verb to comment under this analogy:

"The sober zeal
"Of age, commenting on prodigious things,"
Pleasures of the Imagination.

And Milton in the same manner the verb to commerce;

"And looks commercing with the skies,
"Thy rapt soul sitting in thine eyes.—Il Penseroso.

499. Something very analogous to this we find in the nouns we verbalize, by changing the s sharp of the noun into the s flat, or of the verb (437.) as a use, and to use; where we may remark, that when the word in both parts of speech is a monosyllable, and so not under the laws of accent, the verb, however, claims the privilege of lengthening the sound of the consonant, when it can, as well as when it cannot, prolong the accentuation: thus we not only find grass altered to graze, brass to brazz, glass to glazz, price to prizz, breath to breathz, &c. but the c or s sharp altered to the s flat in advise to advizz, excuse to excuzz, devise to devizz, &c. The noun adopting the sharp hissing sound, and the verb the soft buzzing one, without transferring the accent from one syllable to another. The vulgar extend this analogy to the noun practice, and the verb to practizz, pronouncing the first with the i short and the c like sharp s, as if written practiss, and the last with the i long and the s like z, as if written practizz: but correct speakers pronounce the verb like the noun: that is, as if written practiss. The noun prophecy and the verb to prophezz follow this analogy, only by writing the noun with the c and the verb with the s, and without any difference of sound, except pronouncing the y in the first like e, and in the last like i long; where we may still discover a trace of the tendency to the barytone pronunciation in the noun, and the oxytone in the verb. (467.) See the words.

500. This seems to be the favourite tendency of English verbs; and where we find it crossed, it is generally in those formed from nouns, rather than the contrary: agreeably to this, Dr. Johnson has observed, that though nouns have often the accent on the latter, yet verbs have it seldom on the former syllable: those nouns which, in the common order of language, must have preceded the verbs, often transmit this accent to the verbs they form, and inversely: thus the noun water must have preceded the verb to water, as the verb to correspond must have preceded the noun correspondent; and to pursue must claim priority to pursuit. So that we may conclude whenever verbs deviate from this rule, it is seldom by chance, and generally in those words only where a superior law of accent takes place.

Accent on Trisyllables.

501. As words increase in syllables, the more easily is their accent known. Nouns sometimes acquire a syllable by becoming plural; adjectives increase a syllable by being compared; and verbs, by altering their tense, or becoming participles: adjectives become adverbs, by adding ly to them; and prepositions precede nouns or verbs without altering the accent of the word to which they are prefixed: so that when once the accent of dissyllables is known, those polysyllables, whose terminations are perfectly English, have likewise their accent invariably settled. Thus lion becomes lioness; poet, poetess; polite becomes politer, or politely, or even politichier: mischievous, happy, happiness; may, lioness becomes lionesses; mischievous, mischievousness; and service, serviceable, serviceableness, serviceably, and unserviceably, without disturbing the accent, either on account of the prepositive un, or the subjunctives able, ably, and ableness.

502. Hence we may perceive the glaring absurdity which prevails even in the first circles; that of pronouncing the plural of princess, and even the singular, with the accent on the second syllable, like success and successes; for we might just as well say, dutchess and dutchesses, as princess and princesses; nor would a correct ear be less hurt with the latter than with the former.

503. So few verbs of three syllables follow the analogy observable in those of two, that if protracting the accent to the last syllable, that this economy seems peculiar to dissyllables; many verbs, indeed, of three syllables are compounded of a preposition of two syllables; and then, according to the primary law of formation, and not the secondary of distinction, we may esteem them radical, and not distinctive: such are contradict, intercede, supersede, contraband, circumscribe, superscribe, &c. while the generality of words ending in the verbal terminations ise and ize, retain the accent of the simple, as criticise, tyrannize, modernize, &c.: and the whole tribe of trisyllable verbs in ate, very few excepted, refuse the accent on the last syllable: but words of three syllables often take their accent from the learned languages from which they are derived; and this makes it necessary to inquire how far English accent is regulated by that of the Greek and Latin.

On the Influence of the Greek and Latin Accent, on the Accent of English Polysyllables.

(a) As our language borrows so largely from the learned languages, it is not wonderful that its pronunciation should be in some measure influenced by them. The rule for placing the Greek accent was, indeed, essentially different from that of the Latin; but words from the Greek, coming to us through the Latin, are often so much latinized as to lose their original accent, and to fall into that of the Latin; and it is the Latin accent which we must chiefly regard, as that which influences our own.

(b) The first general rule that may be laid down is, that when words come to us whole from the Greek or Latin, the same accent ought to be preserved as in the original: thus horizon, sonorous, decorum, dictator, gladiator, mediator, delator, spectator, adulator, &c. preserve the penultimate accent of the original; and yet the antepenultimate tendency of our language has placed the accent on the first syllable of orator, senator, auditor, cicatrix, plethora, &c. in opposition to the Latin pronunciation of these words, and would have infallibly done the same by abdomen, bitumen, and acumen, if the learned had not stepped in to rescue these classical words from the invasion of the Gothic accent, and to preserve the stress invariably on the second syllable: nor has even the interposition of two consonants been always able to keep the accent from mounting up to the antepenultimate syllable, as we may see in minister, sinister, character, &c.: and this may be said to be the favourite accent of our language. See Miscellany.

(e) But, notwithstanding this prevalence of the antepenultimate accent, the general rule still holds good; and more particularly in words a little removed from common usage, such as terms in the arts and sciences: these are generally of Greek origin; but, coming to us through the Latins, most commonly contract the Latin accent when adopted into our language. This will appear plainly by the following lists: and, first, let us select some where the Greek and Latin accents coincide:

|--------------------------------|---------------------------------|
| plethōra, πληθώρα, | antiphrasis, αντίφρασις, |
| metabasis, μετάβασις, | protasis, πρότασις, |
| emphasis, ἐμφασις, | metathesis, μετάθεσις, |
| antispasis, αντίσπασις, | epenthesis, ἐπένθεσις, |
| antithesis, αντίθεσις, | aphaeresis, ἀφαίρεσις. |

(d) Another list will show us where the accents of these languages differ:

|-----------------------------------|-----------------------------------|
| antanaclasis, αντανάκλασις | hydrophobia, ὕδροφοβία, |
| catachresis, κατάχρησις, | cyclopædia, κυκλοπαίδεια, |
| paracæsis, παράκæσις, | aporia, ἀπορία, |
| aposiopesis, ἀποσιώπησις, | prosopopeia, προσωποποιία, |
| antiphrasis, αντίφρασις, | epiphonema, ἐπιφώνημα, |
| anadiplosis, ἀναδίπλωσις, | diaphoresis, διαφύρασις, |
| auxesis, αὐξήσις, | díploma, δίπλωμα, |
| mathesis, μάθησις, | paragoge, παράγωγη, |
| exegesis, ἐξηγήσις, | apostrophi, ἀποστροφή. |

In this list we perceive the peculiar tendency of the Latin language, to accent the long penultimate vowel; and that of the Greek, to pay no regard to it, if the last vowel is short, but to place the accent on the antepenultimate. It will, however, be easily perceived, that in this case we follow the Latin analogy: this analogy will appear more evident by a list of words ending in osis, where, though the o in the penultimate syllable is the omega, the Greek accent is on the antepenultimate:

|---------------------|----------------------|----------------------|---------------------|
| νευράρκωσις, | αναμάρφωσις, | αναστρέφωσις, | αμαύρωσις, |
| αποθέωσις, | μεταμάρφωσις, | συνάδρωσις, | συνικεῖωσις, |
| γρηφώσις, | δαρφαίρωσις, | διζήρωσις, | απονεύρωσις. |

This analogy has led us to accent certain words formed from the Greek, where the omega was not in the penultimate of the original, in the same manner as those words where this long vowel was found: such as exostosis, formed from ex and osteon; synneurosis, from syn and neuron, &c. This tendency, therefore, has sufficiently formed an analogy; and since rules, however absurdly formed at first, are better than no rules at all, it would, in my opinion, be advisable to consider every word of this form as subject to the penultimate accent, and to look upon apothæsis and metamorphosis as exceptions.

(e) The next rule we may venture to lay down as a pretty general one, is, that if the words derived from the learned languages, though anglicised by altering the termination, contain the same number of syllables as in the original languages, they are generally to be pronounced with the same accent; that is, with the same accent as the first person present of the indicative mood active voice, or as the present participle of the same verb. The reality of this rule will best appear by a selection of such classes of words as have an equal number of syllables in both languages.

(f) Words which have a in the penultimate syllable:

|--------------------------------|-------------------------------|
| prévalent, πρæváλens, | infamous, infámis, |
| equivalent, æquivaléns, | propagate, propágo, |
| adjacent, adjacens, | indagate, indágo, |
| ligament, ligámen, | súffragan, súffragans. |

In this small class of words we find all but the first two have a different accent in English from that of the Latin. The rule for placing the accent in that language being the simplest in the world: if the penultimate syllable is long, the accent is on it; if short, the accent is on the antepenultimate.

(g) Words which have e in the penultimate syllable:

|--------------------------------|------------------------------|
| pénétrate, penétrô, | exuberant, exubérans, |
| discrepant, discrepans, | eminent, emínens, |
| præcedent, præcédens, | excellent, excellens, |
| elegant, elégans, | alienate, aliénô, |
| exuperant, exupérans, | délegate, délêgo, |

In this class we find the penultimate e accented in English as in Latin, except in the last three words. The word alienate departs from the Latin accentuation, by placing the stress on the first syllable, as if derived from the English noun alien. The e in penetro is either long or short in Latin, and in this case we generally prefer the short sound to the long one.

(h) Words which have i in the penultimate syllable:

|-----------------------------------|----------------------------------|
| acclivous, acclivus, | perspicience, perspicéns, |
| declivous, declivus, | conscience, consciens, |
| proclivous, proclivus, | obedience, obediens, |
| litigant, litigans, | pestilence, pestilens, |
| mitigant, mitigans, | supplicate, supplicans, |
| sibillant, sibilans, | explicans, explicans, |
| vigilant, vigilans, | abdicans, abdicans, |
| fulminant, fulminans, | providence, providens, |
| discriminate, discrimino, | festinate, festinans, |
| habitant, habitans, | médicant, médicans, |
| beneficent, beneficius, | résident, residens, |
| accident, accidens, | diffidence, diffidens, |
| évident, evidens, | confidence, confidens, |
| indigent, indigens, | investigate, investigo, |
| diligent, diligens, | castigate, castigo, |
| négligent, negligens, | extricate, extrico, |
| exigence, exigens, | irritate, irrito, |
| intelligence, intelligens, | profligate, profigo, |
| deficiency, deficiens, | instigate, instigo. |

In the foregoing list of words we find a very general coincidence of the English and Latin accent, except in the last eleven words, where we depart from the Latin accent on the penultimate, and place it on our own favourite syllable, the antepenultimate. These last words must, therefore, be ranked as exceptions.

(i) Words which have o in the penultimate syllable:

|--------------------------------|--------------------------------|
| intérogate, interrogo, | omnipotent, omnipotens, |
| arrogant, arrogans, | innocent, innocens, |
| dissonnant, dissonans, | renovate, renovo, |
| rédolent, redolens, | désolate, desolo, |
| insolent, insolens, | décorate, decoro, |
| benévolo, benevolens, | élaborate, elaboro, |
| condolence, condolens, | lâborate, laboro, |
| indolence, indolens, | ignorant, ignorans, |
| armipotent, armipotens, | suffocate, suffoco. |

In this list the difference of the English and Latin accent is considerable. The last six words desert the Latin penultimate for the English antepenultimate accent, and condolence falls into an accentuation diametrically opposite.

(k) Words which have u in the penultimate syllable:

|------------------------------|------------------------------|
| fâbulate, fabulor, | pópulate, populo, |
| mâculate, maculo, | subjugate, subjugo, |
| âdjuvate, adjuvo, | abducant, abducens, |
| córrugate, corrigo, | relucant, relucens, |
| pétulant, petulans, | imprudent, imprudens, |
| disputant, disputans, | âdjutant, adjutans, |
| impudent, impudens, | peculate, peculor, |
| spéculate, speculor, | indurate, induro, |
| pállulate, pullulo, | obdurate, obduro. |

Here we find the general rule obtain, with, perhaps, fewer exceptions than in any other class. Adjuvate, peculate, and indurate, are the only absolute deviations; for obdurate has the accent frequently on the second syllable. See the word.

(l) To these lists, perhaps, might be added the English words ending in tion, sion, and ity: for, though tion and sion are really pronounced in one syllable, they are, by almost all our orthoëpists, generally divided into two and consequently nation, pronunciation, occasion, evasion, &c., contain the same number of syllables as natin, pronunciatio, ocasio, evasio, &c., and have the accent in both English and Latin, on the antepenultimate syllable. The same may be observed of words ending in ity, as diversity, variety, &c., from diversitas, varietas, &c.

(m) By this selection, (which, though not an exact enumeration of every particular, is yet a sufficient specimen of the correspondence of Latin and English accent,) we may perceive that there is a general rule running through both languages, respecting the accent of polysyllables, which is, that, when a single vowel in the penultimate is followed by a single consonant, the accent is on the antepenultimate. This is so agreeable to English analogy, that, in words derived from the Latin, where the penultimate vowel, followed by a single consonant, is long, and consequently has the accent, we almost always neglect this exception, as it may be called, in the Latin language, and fall into our own general rule of accenting the antepenultimate. Nor is it unworthy of being remarked, that, when we neglect the accent of the original, it is almost always to place it at least a syllable higher; as adjacent and condolence are the only words in the whole selection, where the accent of the English word is placed lower than in the Latin.

(n) There is, indeed, a remarkable coincidence of accent between Latin verbs of three syllables, commencing with a preposition, and the English words of two syllables.

bles, derived from them, by dropping a syllable,* as ex-cello, rebellō, inquirō, confūto, confūto, consumō, destrō, explorō, procedō, proclamō, have the accent in Latin on the second syllable: and the English verbs excel, rebel, inquire, confine, confuse, consume, desire, explore, proceed, proclaim, have the accent on the same syllable. This propensity of following the Latin accent in these words, perhaps, in this, as well as in other cases, formed a general rule, which, at last, neglected the Latin accent, in words of this kind: as we find prefer, confer, defer, desert, compare, complete, congeal, divide, dispute, prepare, deferō, confērō, destrō, comparō, complēō, congēlo, dividō, dispūto, preparō, have the accent on the first; and this propensity, perhaps, laid the foundation of that distinction of accent which is so remarkable between dissyllable nouns and verbs of the same form. (192.)

(o) But when English polysyllables are derived from the Latin by dropping a syllable, scarcely any analogy is more apparent than the coincidence of the principal accent of the English word, and the secondary accent (522), we give to the Latin word, in the English pronunciation of it. Thus, parsimony, ceremony, matrimony, melancholy, &c. have the accent on the first syllable, because, in pronouncing the Latin words parsimonia, ceremonia, matrimonia, melancholia, &c. we have the accent on the first; and this propensity, perhaps, laid the foundation of that distinction of accent which is so remarkable between dissyllable nouns and verbs of the same form. See Academy, Irreparable, &c.

(p) With respect to the quantity of the antepenultimate syllable in polysyllables, it may be observed, that, regardless of the quantity of the original, we, almost without exception, follow the analogy of our own language. This analogy uniformly shortens the vowel, unless it be u, followed by a single consonant, or any other vowel, followed by a single consonant, succeeded by a semi-consonant diphthong; thus the first u in dubius is pronounced long, though short in the Latin word dūbius: the same may be observed of the e and o in medium and empīrium; and the first i in delirium, and the first e in delicate, are pronounced short in English, according to our own analogy, (507.) though these letters are long in the Latin delirium and delicatus. For the quantity of English dissyllables derived from the Greek and Latin, See Syllabication, No. 543, 544, &c.

Terminational Accent.

504. We have seen that the Saxon terminations, regardless of harmony, always leave the accent where they found it, let the adventitious syllables be ever so numerous. The Saxons, attentive chiefly to sense, preserved the same simplicity in the accentuation, as in the composition of their words; and if sense were the only object of language, it must be confessed that our ancestors were, in this respect, superior to the Greeks and Romans. What method could so rigidly preserve, and so strongly convey the sense of words, as that which always left the accent on the root, where the principal meaning of the word undoubtedly lies? But the necessities of human nature require, that our thoughts should not only be conveyed with force, but with ease; to give language its due effect, it must be agreeable as well as forceful; and the ear must be addressed while we are informing the mind. Here, then, terminational accent, the music of language, interposes; corrects the discordant, and strengthens the feeble sounds; removes the difficulty of pronunciation which arises from placing the accent on initial syllables, and brings the force gently down to the latter part of the word, where a cadence is formed, on the principles of harmony and proportion.

505. To form an idea of the influence of termination upon accent, it will be sufficient to observe, that words which have ei, ia, ie, io, eou, in their termination, always have the accent on the preceding syllable: thus atheist, alien, regalia, ambrosia, &c. the numerous terminations in ion, ian, &c. as gradation, promotion, confusion, logician, physician, &c. those in iou, as harmonious, abstemious, &c. those in eous, as outrageous, advantageous, &c. These may not improperly be styled semi-consonant diphthongs. (196.)

506. The only exceptions to this rule are one word in iack, as elegiack, which has the accent on the i, and the following words in iactal, as prosiadical, cardiacal, heliactal, genethiactal, maniacal, demoniacal, ammoniacal,

* Ben Jonson seems to have had a faint idea of this coincidence, where he says, "all verbs coming from the Latin, either of the supine or otherwise, hold the accent as it is found in the first person present of those Latin verbs, as animō, animāte, cēlebro, cēlebrate; except words compounded of facio, as lique-facio, liquefy; and of statuo, as constituo, constitute" English Grammar. Of the extent and justness of these observations, the critical reader will be the best judge.

theriactal, paradisiactal, aphrodisiactal, and hypochondriactal: all which have the accent on the antepenultimate i, and that long and open, as in idle, title, &c.

507. Nothing can be more uniform than the position of the accent in words of these terminations, and, with very few exceptions, the quantity of the accented vowel is as regular as the accent; for when these terminations are preceded by a single consonant, every accented vowel is long, except i; which, in this situation, is as uniformly short: thus, ocasion, adhesion, erosion, and confusion, have the a, e, o, and u long; while vision and decision have the i short. The same may be observed of probation, concretion, devotion, ablation, and exhibition. The exceptions are impetuous, especial, perpetual, discretion and battalion, which last ought to be spelled with double l, as in the French, from which it is derived, and then it would follow the general rule. National and rational form two more exceptions; and these are almost the only irregularities to which these numerous classes of words are subject.

508. Nearly the same uniformity, both of accent and quantity, we find in words ending in ick. The accent immediately precedes this termination, and every vowel under this accent but i is short; thus satanick, pathetic, elliptick, harmonick, &c. have the accent on the penultimate, and the vowel short; while twinnick, runnick, and cubnick, have the accented vowel long.

509. The same may be observed of words ending in ical, as fanatical, poetical, leistical, canonical, &c. which have the accent on the antepenultimate syllable, and the vowels e, i, and o, short; but cubical and musical, with the accent on the same syllable, have the u long.

510. The only exceptions to this rule are arsenick, cholerick, ephemeric, turmeric, empirick, rhetoric, bishoprick, lunatick, arithmetick, splenetic, heretic, politic, and perhaps phlegmatick; which, though more frequently heard with the accent on the antepenultimate syllable, ought, if possible, to be reduced to regularity. Words ending in science have uniformly the accent on the penultimate syllable, as quiescence, reminiscence, &c.; conspicience, which has the accent on the antepenultimate, is the only exception.

511. In the same manner, if we take a view of the words ending in ity, we find the accent invariably placed on the preceding syllable, as in diversity, congruity, &c. On a closer inspection we find every vowel in this antepenultimate syllable, when no consonant intervenes, pronounced long as deity, piety, &c. A nearer inspection shows us, that, if a consonant precede this termination, the preceding accented vowel is short, except it be u, as severity, curiosity, impunity, &c. we find too, that even u contracts itself before two consonants, as in curvity, taciturnity, &c. and that scarcity and rarity (signifying uncommonness: for rarity, thinness, has the a short,) are the only exceptions to this rule throughout the language. The same observations are applicable to words ending in ify, as justify, clarify, &c. The only words where the antepenultimate accent in words of this termination does not shorten the vowel, are glorify and notify. The y in these words is always long, like the first sound of i; and both accent and quantity are the same when these words take the additional syllable able, as justifiable, rarefiable, &c. (183.)

512. To these may be added the numerous class of words ending in arous, erous, and ous, as barbarous, vociferous, and humorous; all which have the accent on the antepenultimate syllable, except canorous and sonorous, which some unlucky scholar happening to pronounce with the accent on the penultimate syllable, in order to show their derivation from the Latin adjectives, canorus and sonorus, they stand like strangers amidst a crowd of similar words, and are sure to betray a mere English scholar into a wrong pronunciation.

To polysyllables in these terminations might be added those in ative, atory, ctive, &c.; words ending in ative can never have the accent on the penultimate syllable, if there is a higher syllable to place it on, except in the word creative; and when this is the case, as it is seldom otherwise, the accent seems to rest on the root of the word; or on that syllable which has the accent on the noun, adjective, or verb, with which the word in ative corresponds; thus copulative, estimative, alternative, &c. follow the verbs to copulate, to estimate, to alter, &c. When derivation does not operate to fix the accent, a double consonant will attract it to the antepenultimate syllable, as appellative; and two consonants have sometimes this power, in opposition to derivation, as adversative and argumentative, from adverse and argument. Indicative and interrogative, are likewise exceptions, as they do not follow the verbs to indicate and interrogate: but as they are grammatical terms, they seem to have taken their accent from the secondary accent we sometimes give to the Latin words indicativus and interrogativus (see the word Academy.) Words ending in ary, ery, or ury, have generally the accent on the root of the word; which, if it consists of three syllables, must necessarily be accented on the first, as contrary, treachery, factory, &c.; if of four or five, the accent is generally on that syllable which has the accent in the related or kindred words; thus expostulatory has the accent on the same radical syllable as expostulate; and congratulatory as congratulate: interrogatory and derogatory are exceptions here, as in the termination ative; and if pacificatory, sacrificatory,* significatory, vesicatory, &c. have not the accent on the first syllable, it seems to arise from the aversion we seem to have at placing even the secondary accent on the antepenultimate a, (which we should be very apt to do if the principal accent were on the first syllable,) and the difficulty there would be in pronouncing such long words with so many unaccented syllables at the end, if we were to lay the accent on the first. Words ending in ctive have the accent regularly on the penultimate syllable, except adjective, which, like indicative, being a grammatical word, seems to have taken its accent from the secondary stress of the Latin adjectives (see Academy); and every word ending in ive, preceded by a consonant, has the accent on the penultimate syllable likewise, except substantive; and, perhaps, for the reason just given. After all, it must be owned, that words ending in ative and atory are the most irregular and desultory of any in the language; as they are generally accented very far from the end, they are the most difficult to pronounce; and therefore, whenever usage will permit, we should incline the stress as much as possible to the latter syllables: thus refractory ought never to have the accent on the first syllable; but refectory, with the accent on the first, is a school term, and, like substantive, adjective, indicative, and interrogative, must be left in quiet possession of their Latin secondary accent.

Enclitical Accent.

513. I have ventured to give the name of enclitical to the accent of certain words, whose terminations are formed of such words as seem to lose their own accent, and throw it back on the last syllable of the word with which they coalesce, such as theology, orthography, &c. The readiness with which these words take the antepenultimate accent, the agreeable flow of sound to the ear, and the unity it preserves in the sense, are sufficient proofs of the propriety of placing the accent on this syllable, if custom were ambiguous. I do not remember to have heard the accent disputed in any word ending in ology; but orthography is not unfrequently pronounced with the accent on the first syllable, like orthodoxy. The temptation we are under to discover our knowledge of the component parts of words, is very apt to draw us into this pronunciation; but as those words which are derived from the Greek, and are compounded of logos, have universally given into this enclitical accentuation, no good reason appears for preventing a similar pronunciation in those compounded of grapho, as, by placing the accent on the antepenultimate syllable, the word is much more fluent and agreeable to the ear. It is certain, however, that at first sight the most plausible reasoning in the world seems to lie against this accentuation. When we place the accent on "the first syllable, say our opponents, we give a kind of subordinate stress to the third syllable graph: by which means the word is divided into its primitives opbos and grapho, and those distinct ideas it contains are preserved, which must necessarily be confounded by the contrary mode; and that pronunciation of compounds, say they, must certainly be the best which best preserves the import of the simples.

514. Nothing can be more specious than this reasoning, till we look a little higher than language, and consider its object; we shall then discover, that, in uniting two words under one accent, so as to form one compound term, we do but imitate the superior operations of the mind, which, in order to collect and convey knowledge, unites several simple ideas into one complex one. "The end of language," says Mr. Locke, "is by short sounds to signify with ease and despatch general conceptions, wherein not only abundance of particulars are contained, but also a great variety of independent ideas are collected into one complex one, and that which holds these different parts together in the unity of one complex idea, is the word we annex to it." For, as Mr. Locke continues, "Men, in framing ideas, seek more the convenience of language, and quick despatch by short and comprehensive signs, than the true and precise nature of things; and therefore, he who has made a complex idea of a body with life, sense, and motion, with a faculty of reason joined to it, need but use the short monosyllable, man, to express all particulars that correspond to that complex idea." So it may be subjoined, that, in framing words for the purpose of immediate communication, the end of this communication is best answered by such a pronunciation as unites simples into one compound, and at the same time renders the compound as much a simple as possible: but it is evident that this is done by no mode of accentuation so well as that which places the accent on the antepenultimate syllable of the words theology, orthography; and therefore that this accentuation, without insisting on its superior harmony, must best answer the great end of language. (338.)

515. This tendency in our language to simplify compounds, is sufficiently evident in that numerous catalogue of words, where we find the long vowel of the simple changed into a short one in the compound, and by this means losing much of its original import to the ear: thus breakfast, shepherd, vineyard, meadow, shadow, zealous, hearken, valley, cleansed, cleanly (neat), forehead, wilderness, benlinder, kindred, hinder, knowledge, darling, fearful, pleasant, pleasure, whistler, whitetailer, seamstress, stealth, wealth, health, wisdom, wizard, parentage, lineage, children, pasty, gosing, collier, holiday, Christmas, Michaelmas, windlass, cripple, hinder, stripling, starling, housewife, husband, primer, peascod, fieldfare, birth from bear, death from dear, weary from wear, and many others, entirely lose the sound of the simple in their compound or derivative.

516. The long i in white, when a simple, is almost universally changed into a short one in proper names, as Whitchurch, Whitefield, Whitbread, Whitlock, Whitaker, &c. for, compendiousness and despatch being next in importance to perspicuity, when there is no danger of mistake, it is no wonder that the organs should fall into the shortest and easiest sounds.

517. It must, however, be observed, that this tendency to unite simples into a compound, by placing an accent exactly where the two words coalesce, is still subservient to the laws of harmony. The Greek word δοκω, which signifies to opine, and from which the last syllables of orthodoxy are derived, was never a general sub-junctive word, like λογος and γραφω; and, even if it had been so, the assemblage of consonants in the letter z would have prevented the ear from admitting an accent on the syllable immediately preceding, as the z would, by this means, become difficult to pronounce. Placing the accent, therefore, on the first syllable of orthodoxy, gives the organs an opportunity of laying a secondary stress upon the third, which enables them to pronounce the whole with distinctness and fluency: thus Galaxy and Cachery, having the accent on the first syllable, are very difficult to pronounce; but this difficulty is removed by placing the accent a syllable higher in the words apoplexy, ataraxy, and anorexy.

518. But the numerous classes of words that so readily adopt this enclitical accent, sufficiently prove it to be agreeable to the genius of our pronunciation. This will more evidently appear by adducing examples. Words in the following terminations have always the accent on that syllable where the two parts unite, that is, on the antepenultimate syllable:

In logy, as apology, ambilogy, genealogy, &c.
In graphy, as geography, orthography, historiography, &c.
In phagus, as sarcophagus, ichthyophagus, androphagus, &c.
In loquy, as obloquy, soliloquy, ventriloquy, &c.
In strophe, as catastrophe, apostrophe, anastrophe, &c.
In meter, as geometer, barometer, thermometer, &c.
In gonal, as diagonal, octagonal, polygonal, &c.
In vorous, as carnivorous, granivorous, piscivorous, &c.
In ferous, as bacciferous, cocciferous, somniferous, &c.
In fluus, as superfluus, mellifluus, fellifluus, &c.
In fluent, as mellifluent, circumfluent, interfluent, &c.
In vomous, as ignivomous, flamivomous, &c.
In parous, as viviparous, oviparous, deiparous, &c.
In cracy, as theocracy, aristocracy, democracy, &c.
In gony, as theogony, cosmogony, hezagony, &c.
In phony, as symphony, cacophony, colophony, &c.
In machy, as theomachy, logomachy, sciomachy, &c.
In nomy, as economy, astrology, deuteronomy, &c.
In tony, as anatomy, lythotomy, arteriotomy, &c.
In scopy, as metascopy, duteroscopy, aerescopy, &c.
In pathy, as apathy, emipathy, idiopathy, &c.
In mathy, as opsimathy, polymathy, &c. &c. &c.

519. Some of these Greek compounds seem to refuse the antepenultimate accent, for the same reason as orthodoxy; such as necromancy, chiromancy, hiromancy and those terminating in archy, as hierarchy, oligarchy, patriarchy, all of which have the accent on the first syllable, which gives the organs time to recover their force upon the third, and to pronounce the two consonants with much more ease than if the accent immediately preceded them; but periphrasis and antiphrasis, besides their claim to the accent of their originals, readily admit of the accent on the second syllable, because the consonants in the two last syllables do not come together, and are therefore easily pronounced after the accent. Words of more than two syllables, ending in ogue, as pedagogue, dialogue, &c. have the accent on the antepenultimate. Orthoepy, having no consonant in the antepenultimate syllable, naturally throws its accent on the first. See Monomachy.

520. By this view of the enclitical terminations, we may easily perceive how readily our language falls into the antepenultimate accent in these compound polysyllables; and that those terminations, which seem to refuse this accent, do it rather from a regard to etymology than analogy: thus words ending in asis, as periphrasis, apophysis, hypostasis, antiperistasis, &c. have the antepenultimate accent of their originals. The same may be observed of those ending in esis, as hypothesis, antithesis, parenthesis, &c.; but exegesis, mathesis, auxesis, catachresis, paracensis, apostrophe, have the accent on the penultimate syllable, because the vowel in this syllable is long in Greek and Latin. But all words ending in osis have the accent on the penultimate, except metamorphosis and apotheosis, which desert the accent of their Latin originals, while those in ysis are accented regularly on the antepenultimate in Greek, Latin, and English, as analysis, paralysis, &c. We may note too, that every s in all these terminations is sharp and hissing. See the words Exostosis and Apotheosis.

521. Words of three syllables ending in ator have the accent on the penultimate, as spectator, collator, delator, &c. except orator, senator, legator, and barrator. But words in this termination, of more than three syllables, though they have generally the accent on the penultimate, are subject to a diversity not easily reduced to the rule: thus navigator, propagator, dedicator, &c. are sometimes pronounced with the accent on the first syllable, and sometimes on the third: but as these words may be pronounced with an accent on both these syllables, it is of less consequence on which syllable we place the accent, when we use only one. (528.) The general rule certainly inclines to the penultimate accent; but as all these words are verbal nouns, and, though generally derived from Latin words of the same terminations, have verbs corresponding to them in our own language, it is very natural to preserve the accent of the verb in these words, as it gives an emphasis to the most significant part of them: thus equivocator, prevaricator, dedicator, might be regularly formed from the verbs equivocate, prevaricate, and dedicate; and, agreeably to analogy, would have been written equivocater, prevaricator, and dedicator; but an affectation of preferring every analogy to our own, has given these words a Latin termination, which answers no purpose, but to involve our language in absurdities; but the ear, in this case, is not quite so servile as the eye: and though we are obliged to write these words with or, and not er, we generally hear them pronounced as if they were formed from our own verbs, and not from Latin nouns in ator. But when the word has no verb in our own language to correspond to it, the accent is then placed with great propriety upon the a, as in Latin: thus violator, instigator, navigator, &c. ought to have the accent on the first syllable; and emendator, gladiator, adulator, &c. on the last but one.

SECONDARY ACCENT.

522. Hitherto we have considered that accent only, which necessarily distinguishes one syllable in a word from the rest: and which, with very little diversity, is adopted by all who speak the English language.

523. The secondary accent is that stress we may occasionally place upon another syllable, besides that which has the principal accent, in order to pronounce every part of the word more distinctly, forcibly, and harmoniously. Thus this accent may be placed on the first syllable of conversation, commendation, &c.

524. There are few authors who have not taken notice of two accents upon some of the longer polysyllables, but none have once hinted, that one of these is not essential to the sound of the word: they seem to have supposed both accents equally necessary, and without any other difference than that one was pronounced more forcibly than the other. This mistake arose from a want of studying the speaking voice. A knowledge of this would have told them, that one accent only was essential to every word of more than one syllable, and that the secondary stress might, or might not, be adopted, as distinctness, force, or harmony, should require; thus complainant, contraband, caravan; and violin, partisan, artisan, courtesan, metaphysick, have frequently an accent on the first, as well as on the third syllable, though a somewhat less forcible one. The same may be observed of repatee, referee, privateer, domineer, &c.; but it must still be observed, that though an accent be allowable on the first syllable of these words, it is by no means necessary; they may all be pronounced with one accent, and that on the last syllable without the least deviation from propriety.

525. In order to give some idea of the nature of the secondary accent, let us suppose, that, in giving our opinion of an astronomical argument, we say,

“It is a direct demonstration of the Copernican system.”

In this sentence, as an accent is necessarily upon the last syllable of direct, we seldom lay a stress on the first syllable of demonstration, unless we mean to be uncommonly emphatical; but in the following sentence,

“It is a démonstration of the Copernican system.”

Here, as no accented word precedes demonstration, the voice finds a rest, and the ear a force, in placing an accent on the first, as well as on the third syllable.

526. But though we may, or may not, use the secondary accent, at pleasure, it is by no means a matter of indifference on what syllable we place it: this is fixed with as much certainty as the place of the principal accent itself; and a wrong position of one would as much derange the sound of the word, as a wrong position of the other: and it must be carefully noted, that, though we lay no stress upon the syllable which may have the secondary accent, the consonants and vowels have exactly the same sound as if the doubtful syllable (as it may be called) were accented. Thus, though I lay no stress upon the second syllable of negotiation, pronunciation, ecclesiastick, &c. the t, g, and s go into the sound of sh and zh, as if the secondary accent were on the preceding syllable. (357) (451) (459.)

527. It may be observed, in the first place, that the secondary accent is always two syllables, at least, distant from the principal accent: thus in demonstration, lamentation, provocation, &c. the secondary accent is on the first syllable, and the principal on the third; and in arteriotomy, meteorology, and hypochondriacal, the secondary accent is on the first, and the principal on the fourth syllable: and in the word indivisibility we may place two secondary accents, one upon the first, and the other on the third.

528. In the next place it may be observed, that though the syllable on which the principal accent is placed is fixed and certain, yet we may, and do frequently, make the secondary principal, and the principal secondary: thus caravan, complainant, violin, repatee, referee, privateer, domineer, courtesan, artisan, charlatan, may all have the greatest stress on the first, and the least on the last syllable, without any violent offence to the ear: nay, it may be asserted, that the principal accent on the first syllable of these words, and none at all on the last, though certainly improper, has nothing in it grating or discordant: but placing an accent on the second syllable of these words would entirely derange them, and produce an intolerable harshness and dissonance. The same observations may be applied to demonstration, lamentation, provocation, navigator, propagator, alligator, and every similar word in the language. But, as we have observed, No. 526, the consonants t, d, c, and s, after the secondary accent, are exactly under the same predicament as after the primary; that is, if they are followed by a diphthong or diphthongal vowel, these consonants are pronounced like sh, tsh, zh, or j, as sententiousness, partiality, &c. (526.)

QUANTITY.

529. In treating this part of pronunciation, it will not be necessary to enter into the nature of that quantity which constitutes poetry; the quantity here considered will be that which relates to words taken singly; and this is nothing more than the length or shortness of the vowels, either as they stand alone, or as they are differently combined with the vowels or consonants. (63.)

530. Quantity, in this point of view, has already been fully considered under every vowel and diphthong in the language. What remains to be said on this subject is, the quantity of vowels under the secondary accent. We have seen that vowels, under the principal accent, before the diphthongs ia, ie, eu, ion, are all long, except i; (507); that all vowels are long before the terminations ity and ety, as deity, piety, &c. (511); that if one or more consonants precede these terminations, every preceding accented vowel, except the a in scarcity and rarity, sig-esifying uncommonness, is short but u: and that the same analogy of quantity is found before the terminations ick and ical, and the numerous enclitical terminations we have just been pointing out. Here we find custom conformable to analogy; and that the rules for the accent and quantity of these words admit of scarcely any exceptions. In other parts of the language, where custom is more capricious, we can still discover general rules, and there are but very few words, in which the quantity of the vowel under the principal accent is not ascertained. Those who have but a common share of education, and are conversant with the pronunciation of the capital, are seldom at a loss for the quantity of the vowel under that accent which may be called principal; but the secondary accent in the longer polysyllables does not seem to decide the quantity of the vowels so invariably. Mr. Sheridan divides the words deglutition, depravation, degradation, dereliction, and democratical, into de-glu-ti-tion, de-pra-va-tion, de-gra-dation, de-re-lic-tion, and de-mo-crat-i-cal; while Dr. Kenrick more accurately divides them into deg-lu-ti-tion, dep-ra-va-tion, deg-ra-da-tion, and dem-o-crat-i-cal; but makes not any distinction between the first in profanation and profane, prodigality and prodigious, provocation and prorogue, though he distinguishes this letter in the first syllable of progress, and that in progression: and though Mr. Sheridan divides retrograde into ret-ro-grade, he divides retrogradation, retrogression, retrospect, retrospection, and retrospective, into re-tro-gra-da-tion, re-tro-gres-sion, re-tro-spect, re-tro-spec-tion, and re-tro-spec-tive. At the first sight of these words we are tempted to prefer the preposition in a distinct syllable, as supposing that mode to convey more distinctly each part of the word; but custom at large, the best interpreter of nature, soon lets us see that these prepositions coalesce with the word they are prefixed to, for reasons greatly superior to those which present themselves at first. (514.) If we observe the tendency of pronunciation, with respect to inseparable prepositions, we shall find, that those compound words which we adopt whole from other languages, we consider as simples, and pronounce them without any respect to their component parts; but those compounds which we form ourselves retain the traces of their formation in the distinction which is observable between the prepositive and radical part of the word: thus retrograde, retrogression, retrospect, and retrospective, coming compounded to us from the Latin, ought, when the accent is on the preposition, to shorten the vowel, and unite it to the root, as in re-sur-rec-tion, re-cal-lec-tion, prep-o-si-tion, &c.; while re-com-mit, re-convey, &c. being compounds of our own; must preserve it separate.

531. From what has been observed arises this general rule: where the compound retains the primary sense of the simples, and the parts of the word are the same in every respect, both in and out of composition, then the preposition is pronounced in a distinct syllable; but when the compound departs ever so little from the literal sense of the simples, the same departure is observable in the pronunciation; hence the different syllabication and pronunciation of re-com-mence and re-com-mend; the former signifies a repetition of a commencement, but the latter does not imply a repetition of a commendation: thus re-petition would signify to petition again; while rep-etition signifies only an iteration of the same act, be it what it will. The same may be observed of the words re-create, and re-creat, re-formation, and re-formation.

532. That this is perfectly agreeable to the nature of the language, appears from the short pronunciation of the vowel in the first syllable of preface, prelate, prelude, prologue, &c. as if divided into pref-a-ce, pre-la-te, pre-lu-de, pro-lu-gue, &c. It is much to be regretted, however, that this short sound of the penultimate vowel has so much obtained in our language, which abounds too much in these sounds; nor can etymology be always pleaded for this pronunciation; for in the foregoing words, the first vowel is long in the Latin prefatior, prelatus, preludium, though short in prólogos: for though, in words from the Greek the preposition πρῶ was short, in Latin it was generally long; and why we should shorten it in progress, project, &c. where it is long in Latin, can only be accounted for by the superficial application of a general rule, to the prejudice of the sound of our language. (543.)

533. It will be necessary, however, to observe, that in forming a judgement of the propriety of these observations, the nicest care must be taken not to confound those prepositions which are under the primary and secondary accent, with those which immediately precede the stress; for preclude, pretend, &c. are under a very different predicament from prologue, preposition, &c.; and the very same law that obliges us to pronounce the vowel short in the first syllable of pro-vi-dence, prov-o-cation, and prof-a-nation, obliges us to pronounce the vowel open, and with some degree of length, in pro-vi-de, pre-vo-ke, and pro-fane. The same may be observed of the e in re-pair, rep-a-ration, re-ply, and rep-li-cation, re-peat and rep-etition, the accent making the whole difference between the quantity of the vowel in one word and the other.

534. The only exception to the shortening power of the secondary accent is the same as that which prevents the shortening power of the primary accent, (503.) namely, the vowel u as in lucubration, or when any other of the vowels are succeeded by a semi-consonant diphthong, (196:) thus mediator and mediatorial have the e in the first syllable as long as in mediate: deviation has the e in the first syllable as long as in deviate, notwithstanding the secondary accent is on it, and which would infallibly have shortened it, if it had not been for the succeeding diphthong ia; and even this diphthong in gladiator has not the power of preserving the first syllable long, though Mr. Sheridan, by his marking it, has made it so.

535. From what has been seen of accent and quantity, it is easy to perceive how prone our language is to an antepenultimate accent, and how naturally this accent shortens the vowels it falls upon: nay, so great a propensity have vowels to shrink under this accent, that the diphthong itself, in some words, and analogy in others, are not sufficient to prevent it, as valiant, retaliator. Thus, by the subjoining only of al to nation, with the o long, it becomes national, with the a short, though contrary to its relation with occasion and congregation, which do not shorten the a upon being made occasional and congregational: in like manner the acquisition of the same termination to the word nature, makes it natural; but this, it may be presumed, is derived from the Latin naturalis, and not from adding al to the English word, as in the foregoing instances; and thus it comes under the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent, notwithstanding the semi-consonant diphthong u.

536. The same shortening power in the antepenultimate accent may be observed in rational and rationate, where the first a in the first word, and the o in the second, are short. The first a in the second word is short also by the power of the secondary accent; though Mr. Sheridan has, in my opinion, very erroneously divided rationation into ra-sho-sy-na-shun; that is, into a syllable less than it ought to have, with the o long instead of short.

537. The accent on the Latin antepenultimate seemed to have something of a similar tendency; for though the great difference in the nature of the Latin and English accent will allow us to argue from one to the other but in very few circumstances, (503.) yet we may perceive in that accent, so different from ours in general, a great coincidence in this particular; namely, its tendency to shorten an antepenultimate syllable. Bishop Hare tells us, that "Quæ acuntur in tertia ab extrema, interdum acuta corripunt, si positione sola longa sunt, ut optime, sérvitus, pérnelim, Pámphilus, et pauca alia, quo Cretici mutantur in Anapestos. Idem factum est in néutiquam, licet incipiat diphthongo." De Metr. Comic. pag. 62. Those words which have the acute accent on the antepenultimate syllable, have sometimes that syllable shortened, if it was only long by position, as optime, sérvitus, pérnelim, Pámphilus, and a few others, which by this means are changed from Cretic to Anapestic feet: nay, néutiquam undergoes the same fate, though it begins with a diphthong.

SYLLABICATION.

538. Dividing words into syllables is a very different operation, according to the different ends proposed by it. The object of syllabication may be, either to enable children to discover the sound of words they are unacquainted with, or to show the etymology of a word, or to exhibit the exact pronunciation of it.

539. When a child has made certain advances in reading, but is ignorant of the sound of many of the longer words, it may not be improper to lay down the common general rule to him, that a consonant between two vowels must go to the latter, and that two consonants coming together must be divided. Farther than this, it would be absurd to go with a child; for telling him that compounds must be divided into their simples, and that such consonants as may begin a word may begin a syllable, requires a previous knowledge of words, which children cannot be supposed to have; and which, if they have, makes the division of words into syllables unnecessary. Children, therefore, may be very usefully taught the general rule above-mentioned, as, in many cases, it will lead them to the exact sound of the word, as in pre-vi-ded: and, in others, it will enable them to give a good guess at it, as in de-li-cate; and this is all that can be expected: for when we are to form an unknown compound sound out of several known simple sounds; (which is the case with children, when we wish them to find out the sound of a word by spelling it;) this, I say, is the only method that can be taken.

540. But an etymological division of words is a different operation: it is the division of a person acquainted with the whole word, and who wishes to convey, by this division, a knowledge of its constituent parts, as orthography, theology, &c.

541. In the same manner, a person, who is pre-acquainted with the whole compound sound of a word, and wants to convey the sound of each part to one unacquainted with it, must divide it into such partial sounds as, when put together again, will exactly form the whole, as ortho-graphy, the-o-log-y, &c. This is the method adopted by those who would convey the whole sound, by giving distinctly every part; and, when this is the object of syllabication, Dr. Lowth's rule is certainly to be followed. "The best and easiest rule," says the learned bishop, "for dividing the syllables in spelling, is, to divide them as they are naturally divided in a right pronunciation, without regard to the derivation of words, or the possible combination of consonants at the termining of a syllable." Introduction to Eng. Gram. page 7.

542. In this view of syllabication, we consider it only as the picture of actual pronunciation; but may we not consider it as directed likewise by some laws of its own? laws, which arise out of the very nature of enunciation, and the specific qualities of the letters? These laws certainly direct us to separate double consonants, and such as are uncombinable from the incoalescence of their sounds; and if such a separation will not paint the true sound of the word, we may be certain that such sound is unnatural, and has arisen from caprice: thus the words chamber, Cambridge, and cambrick, must be divided at the letter m; and as this letter, by terminating the syllable, according to the settled rules of pronunciation, shortens the vowel, the general pronunciation given to these words must be absurd, and contrary to the first principles of the language. Angel, ancient, danger, manger, and ranger*, are under the same predicament; but the paucity of words of this kind, so far from weakening the general rule, strengthens it. See Change.

543. By an induction which demonstrates the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent, has been shown the propriety of uniting the consonant to the vowel in the first syllable of demonstration, lamentation, propagation, &c.: we thus decide upon the quantity of these vowels, which are so uncertain in our best dictionaries; and may we not hope, by a similar induction, and with the first principles of language in view, to decide the true, genuine, and analogical sound of some words of another kind, which waver between different pronunciations? The antepenultimate accent has unquestionably a shortening power; and I have not the smallest doubt that the penultimate accent has a lengthening power; that is, if our own words, and words borrowed from other languages, of two syllables, with but one consonant in the middle, had been left to the general ear, the accent on the first syllable would have infallibly lengthened the first vowel. A strong presumption of this arises from our pronunciation of all Latin dissyllables in this manner, without any regard to the quantity of the original, (see Drama), and the ancient practice of doubling the consonant when preceded by a single vowel in the participial terminations, as to begin, beginning, to regret, regretted: and I believe it may be confidently affirmed, that words of two syllables from the Latin, with but one consonant in the middle, would always have had the first vowel long, if a pedantic imitation of Latin quantity had not prevented it. (See Drama.) Let an Englishman, with only an English education, be put to pronounce zephyr, and he will, without hesitation, pronounce the e long, as in zenith: if you tell him the e is pronounced short in the Latin zephyrus, which makes it short in English, and he should happen to ask you the Latin quantity of the first syllable of comick, mimick, solace, &c., your answer would be a contradiction to your rule.—What irrefragably proves this to be the genuine analogy of English quantity, is the different quantity we give a Latin word of two syllables when in the nominative, and when in an oblique case: thus in the first syllable of sidus and nomen, which ought to be long, and of miser and onus, which ought to be short, we equally use the common long sound of the vowels: but in the oblique cases, sideris, nominis, miseri, oneris, &c., we use quite another sound, and that a short one; and this analogy runs through the whole English pronunciation of the learned languages. (533) (535).

544. But the small dependence of the English quantity on that of the Latin will be best seen by a selection of words of two syllables, with the accent on the first, and but one consonant in the middle, and comparing them with the Latin words from which they are derived.

English dissyllables which have but one consonant, or a mute and liquid in the middle, and have the first syllable accented, contrasted with the Latin words from which they are derived, marked with their respective quantities.

545. In this view of the Latin and English quantity, we see how uncertain it is to argue from the former to the latter; for, though the Latin accent is frequently a rule for placing the English accent, as in words derived whole from that language, as abdomen, acumen, &c. (503.) or preserving the same number of syllables, as in impudent, elegant, from impudens, elegans, &c. (503.) yet the quantity of the Latin seems to have no influence on that of the English. In words of two syllables, where one consonant comes between two vowels, as fucus, basis local, &c., though the vowel in the first syllable is short in Latin, it is long in English; and inversely, florid, frigid, livid, &c., have the vowels in the first syllable short, though these vowels are long in floridus, frigidus, lividus, &c.; so that, if any thing like a rule can be formed, it is that when a word of three syllables in Latin, with the two first short, is anglicised by dropping the last syllable, we shorten the first syllable of the English dissyllable, unless it ends with the vowel u. (535.) Thus we see the shortening power of our English antepenultimate accent, which shortens every antepenultimate vowel but u, in our pronunciation of Latin words; as in minimus, viduus, &c.; and continues its shortening power in the penultimate accent of these words when anglicised into mimick and vidid; and hence it is that the short quantity of the first vowel in dissyllables is become so prevalent in our language, to the great detriment of its sound, and the disturbance of its simplicity.

It may be necessary, in the next place, to take a view of such words as are either of Saxon or French original, or not so immediately derived from the Latin, as to be influenced by its quantity.

From the perusal of this selection, we see a great majority of words where the first vowel is sounded short, and, therefore, to some inspectors, it may seem improbable that the original tendency of our Saxon language was to the long quantity of the penultimate vowel. But, as Mr. Nares very judiciously observes, "the rule is sufficiently general to be admitted, and is undoubtedly founded in the nature of our pronunciation;" for which he quotes Dr. Wallis, who says, "Hæc videtur genuina linguæ nostræ ratio antiqua." Elements of Orthoëpy, page 225.

546. Those who have made the progress of languages their study will observe, it is presumed, that the broad sounds of vowels change to the slender,* the difficult consonants to the easier, and the long vowels to short ones. This, it is imagined, will be found to be true in all languages, as well as our own; and such alteration seems founded in the nature of man and of society. The next object to understanding a language being despatch, it is no wonder that short sounds have been encroaching on us, and depriving us of the tune of our words for the sake of gaining time. This is apparent in the abbreviation of simples when compounded, as in knowledge, shepherd, &c. (518;) but, as it is the business of art to correct and regulate the eccentricities of nature and the excesses of custom, it should be the care of every philosophick grammarian to keep his eye upon the original genius and general scope of his language, and to suffer custom to depart as little from them as possible. But, although no inconsistency or want of analogy can alter any pronunciation which is once acknowledged and settled, yet, when a pronunciation is wavering, consistency, analogy, and general principles, ought to decide against a great majority of mere fashion and caprice.

Thus have I endeavoured to give a distinct view of the correspondence between the accent and quantity of the learned languages and our own, and to rescue a plain Englishman (who, as Ben Jonson says of Shakspeare, has little Latin and less Greek,) from the supercilious criticism of those Greeklings and Latinistasters, who are often remarkably ignorant of their own language, and yet frequently decide upon its accent and quantity, because they have a smattering of Greek and Latin. If the question turns upon the accent of an English word, the Latin word it is derived from is immediately produced and sentence passed without appeal: and yet, if the Englishman were to ask the rule on which this decision is founded, the scholar would, in all probability, be at a loss to tell him. Has every English word, he might say the same accent as the Latin word from which it is derived? This the scholar could not answer in the affirmative, as the least recollection would tell him that parsimony, acrimony, &c. cannot be accented after the Latin parsimonia, acrimonia, &c., as the Latin is never accented higher than the antepenultimate. But perhaps the English word is adopted whole from the Latin. Here is undoubtedly a fair pretence for pronouncing it with the Latin accent; and yet we see how many exceptions there are to this rule (see No. 503, b.) Or, perhaps, the English word, though anglicised, retains the same number of syllables. This, indeed, may be said to be a general rule for preserving the Latin accent, but so general as to be neglected in a thousand instances, (see No. 503, f, g, h, i, k.) But if the scholar, as is often the case, huddles quantity and accent together, and infers the English quantity from the Latin; the English scholar needs only to refer him to the selections here given, (No. 544, 545,) to show the inanity of such a plea. Upon the whole, therefore, I flatter myself that men of learning will be gratified to see the subject in a clearer point of view than any in which it has ever been exhibited; and the plain English scholar will be indebted to me for giving him as clear and distinct an idea of the connexion between the Greek and Latin accent and quantity, and the accent and quantity of his native tongue, as if he had Homer and Horace by heart; and for placing him out of the reach of those pert minor critics, who are constantly insulting him with their knowledge of the dead languages.

Of the Quantity of the Unaccented Vowels not in the same Syllable with Consonants.

547. Accented syllables, as we have before observed, (179,) are so strongly marked as to be easily comprehended when they are once settled by custom or analogy; but those immediately before or after the accent are in a state of uncertainty, which some of our best judges find themselves unable to remove. Some grammarians have called all the open vowels, before or after the accent, short though the ear so evidently dictates the contrary in the u in utility, the o in obedience, &c. Some have saved themselves the trouble of farther search by comprehending these vowels under the epithet obscure; nay, so unfixed do the sounds of these vowels seem, that Dr. Kenrick, whose Rhetorical Dictionary shows he was possessed of very great philological abilities, seems as much at a loss about them as the meanest grammarian in the kingdom; for, when he comes to mark the sound of the vowel o, in the first syllable of a series of words, with the accent on the second, he makes the o in promulge, propel, and prolix, long, as they ought to be; and the same letter in proboscis, proceed, and procedure, short. Dominion, domestick, donation, and domain, are marked as if pronounced dom-in-ion, dom-est-ick, don-a-tion, and dom-a-in, with the o short; while the first of docility, potential, and monotony, have the o marked long, as in donor, potent, and modish; though it is certain to a demonstration, that, the etymology, accent, and letters being the same, the same sound must be produced, unless where custom has precisely marked a difference; and that the first syllables of promulge, propel, and prolix, and those of proboscis, proceed, and procedure, have no such difference, seems too evident to need proof.*

548. I know it may be demanded, with great plausibility, How do I know that there is not this very inconsistency in custom itself? What right have I to suppose that custom is not as vague and capricious in these syllables as in those under the accent? To which I answer: If custom has determined the sound of these vowels, the dispute is at an end. I implicitly acquiesce in the deci-

* Alioqui, pro usu, abusus & inveteratus error nobis obtruderetur. Olim enim pro mutatione sonorum mutabantur & literæ: & si quando consuetudo aliquid mutasset, scribendi quoque modus statim variabatur. Unde quum apud Ennium & Plautum Sunt & Servos diceretur & scriberetur, postea multum aurium delictis & vocali relecta, quod vastus illius videretur sonus, u litera substituta est, & sono expressa; ita ut eorum loco Sunt & Servos prolatum & scriptum sit Adolphi Mekecheri Brugensis De Vet. et Rect. Pronun. Lingue Græcæ Commentarius.

* I am aware that this ingenious writer seems to avoid this inconsistency, by premising, in his Rhetorical Grammar, page 43, that he has sometimes marked the o in words beginning with a preposition with the oratorical, and sometimes with the colloquial pronunciation: thus, in commune, communicate, &c., the oratorical sound is given, as in the first syllable of common, while the colloquial sound changes the o into u, as if the words were written commune, communicate, &c.: but the distinction in these examples does not touch the point; here there is a change only of one short sound for another, and not any promiscuous use of the same letter. Dr. Kenrick himself, when he marks the o in proboscis, proceed, and procedure, does not adopt the short u, as he does in commune, communicate, &c.; nor is he aware of the essential difference, with respect to the quantity of the vowel, in the double consonant in one set of words, and the single one in the other.

on; but if professors of the art disagree in their opinions, it is a shrewd sign that custom is not altogether so clear in its sentence; and I must insist on recurring to principles till custom has unequivocally decided.

549. Every vowel, that is neither shortened by the accent, nor succeeded by a double consonant, naturally terminates a syllable; and this terminating vowel, though not so properly long as if the accent were on it, would be very improperly termed short, if by short, as is often the case, be meant shut. (65.) According to this idea of syllabification, it is presumed that the word opinion would fall into three distinct parts, and every part be terminated by a consonant but the first, thus, o-pin-ion.

550. But it may be demanded, What reason is there, in the nature of the thing, for dividing the word in this manner, rather than into op-in-ion, where a consonant ends every syllable? In this, as in many other cases of delicacy, we may be allowed to prove what is right by first proving what is wrong. Every ear would be hurt, if the first syllables of opinion and opulence were pronounced exactly alike: op-in-ion would be as different from o-pin-ion, as o-pu-lence from op-u-lence, and consequently a different syllabification ought to be adopted; but, as opulence is rightly divided into op-u-lence, opinion must be divided into o-pin-ion; that is, the e must be necessarily separated from the p, as in o-pen; for, as was before observed, every vowel pronounced alone has its own sound, as nothing but its junction with a consonant can shut it, and consequently unaccented vowels, not necessarily joined to a consonant, are always open: therefore, without violating the fundamental laws of pronunciation, opinion must necessarily be divided into o-pin-ion, and not op-in-ion, and the o pronounced as in the word open, and not as in opulence: which was the thing to be proved.

551. If these reasons are valid with respect to the vowel in question, they have the same force with respect to every other vowel not shut by a consonant throughout the language. That the vowels in this situation are actually open, we may easily perceive by observing that vowel, which, from its diphthongal and semi-consonant sound, is less liable to suffer by obscure pronunciation than any other. The letter u, in this situation, always preserves itself full and open, as we may observe in utility, lubrication, &c. The o, the most open of all the simple vowels, has the same tendency in obedience, opaque, position, &c., the e in the first syllable of event, in the second of delegate, the first and third of evangelist, in the second of gayety, niceety, &c., the a in the first of abate, and the second of probable, &c., and the i in nullity. This unaccented letter being no more than e, and this sound, when long, corresponding exactly with its short sound, which is not the case with any of the other vowels, (65) (66.) the difference between the long and short, or open and shut sound of this letter, is less perceptible than in any other: yet we may easily perceive, that a delicate pronunciation evidently leaves it open when unaccented in indivisibility, as this word would not be justly pronounced if the i in every syllable were closed by a consonant, as if divided into in-di-vis-i-bil-it-y: the first, third, and fifth syllables, would indeed, be justly pronounced according to this division, as these have all accentual force, which shuts this vowel, and joins it to the succeeding consonant; but in the second, fourth, and sixth syllables, there is no such force, and consequently it must remain open and unconnected with the consonant; though, as was before observed, the long and short sound of this vowel are so near each other, that the difference is less perceived than in the rest. Every ear would be displeased at such a pronunciation as is indicated by ut-til-it-y, luc-cub-bra-tion, op-pin-ion, posi-tion, ev-vent, ev-van-gel-ist, ab-bate, prob-able, &c.; but, for exactly the same reasons, that the vowels out of the stress ought to be kept open in these words, the slender i must be kept open in the same situation in the word in-di-vis-i-bil-it-y, and every similar word in the language.*

552. From all this it will necessarily follow, that the custom adopted by the ancients and moderns of joining the single consonant to the latter vowel in syllabification, when investigating the unknown sound of a word, has its foundation in reason and good sense: that the only reason why vowels are short and shut, is their junction with a consonant; so those that are not joined to consonants, when we are not speaking metrically, cannot be said to be either short or shut: and that, as all accented vowels, when final, or pronounced alone, have their own sound, so those vowels that are alone, or final in a syllable, must necessarily retain their open sound likewise, as nothing but uniting instantaneously with the succeeding consonant can shut them: and, though nothing but a delicate ear will direct us to the degree of openness with which we must pronounce the first unaccented o in docility, domestic, potential, proceed, monastic, monotony, &c., we may be assured that it is exactly under the same predicament, with respect to sound, in all these words; and, as they can never be pronounced short and shut, as if written docility, domestic, &c., without hurting the duldest ear; so the e in event, evangelist, &c., and the i in the third syllable of utility, and in the second, fourth, and sixth of indivisibility, can never be sounded as if joined to the consonant without offending every delicate ear, and overturning the first principles of pronunciation.

553. The only considerable exception to this general rule of syllabification, which determines the sound of the unaccented vowels, is when e succeeds the accent, and is followed by r, as in literal, general, misery, &c., which can never be pronounced lit-e-r-al, gen-e-r-al, mis-e-ry, &c., without the appearance of affectation. In this situation, we find the r corrupts the sound of the e, as it does that of every other vowel when in a final, unaccented syllable. For, this consonant being nothing more than a jar, it unavoidably mixes with the e in this situation, and reduces it to the obscure sound of short u, (418.) a sound to which the other unaccented vowels before r have sometimes so evident a tendency.

554. An obscure idea of the principles of syllabification just laid down, and the contradiction to them perceived in this exception, has made most of our orthoepists extremely wavering and uncertain in their division of words into syllables, when the unaccented e has preceded r, where we not only find them differing from each other but sometimes even from themselves:

555. I have been the more copious in my collection of these varieties, that I might not appear to have taken the advantage of any oversight or mistake of the press: nor is it any wonder, when the principles of syllabification so strongly incline us to leave the vowel e, like the other vowels, open before a single consonant; and the ear so decidedly tells us, that this letter is not always open when preceded by the accent, and followed by r,—it is no wonder, I say, that a writer should be perplexed, and that he should sometimes incline to one side, and sometimes to the other. I am conscious I have not always been free from this inconsistency myself. The examples, therefore, which I have selected, will, I hope, fully justify me in the syllabification I have adopted; which is, that of sometimes separating the e from the r in this situation, and sometimes not. When solemn and deliberate speaking has seemed to admit of lengthening the e, I have sometimes made it end the syllable; when this was not the case, I have sometimes joined it to the r: thus, as e in the penultimate syllable of incarcerate, reverberate, &c., seems, in solemn speaking, to admit of a small degree of length and distinctness, it ends a syllable; but as no solemnity of pronunciation seems to admit of the same length and openness of the e in tolerate, deliberate, &c., it is united with r, and sounded in the notation by short u. It ought, however, to be carefully observed,

* It is plain that Mr. Sheridan considered the unaccented vowel i, whether ending a syllable or joined to the succeeding consonant, as standing for the same sound; for we see him sometimes making use of one division, and sometimes of another: thus he divides the word di-ver-si-ty with the i terminating the penultimate syllable, and u-ni-ver-si-ty with the same i united to the consonant. The same variety takes place in the words di-vis-i-bil-it-y and in-di-vis-i-bil-it-y; while Dr. Kenrick divides all words of this termination regularly in the former manner.

that, though the e in this situation is sometimes separated from the r, there is no speaking, however deliberate and solemn, that will not admit of uniting it to r, and pronouncing it like short u, without offending the nicest and most critical ear.

556. It must also be noted, that this alteration of the sound of e before r is only when it follows the accent, either primary or secondary, (522) (530:) for, when it is in the first syllable of a word, though unaccented, it keeps its true sound: thus, though the e is pronounced like u in alter, alteration, &c., yet in perfection, terrific, &c., this letter is as pure as when the accent is on it in perfect, terrible, &c.

557. Something like the corruption of the sound of unaccented e before r, we may perceive in the colloquial pronunciation of the vowel o in the same situation; and accordingly we find our best orthoëpists differ in their notation of this letter: thus memory, memorable, immemorable, memorably, memorize, have the o pronounced like short u by Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Scott; and memorandum with the o as in open; while Dr. Kenrick gives the o in all these words the sound it has in the conjunction or. Mr. Sheridan marks the unaccented o in corporal, corporate, and corporation, like the o in open; but Mr. Scott pronounces this o in corporal, corporate, and corporation, like short u, and the same letter in incorporate and incorporation like Mr. Sheridan; and Dr. Kenrick like the o in the former instances. Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Scott are uniform in their pronunciation of the same vowel like short u in armour, armorer, armory, pillory, suasory, persuasory, allegory, compulsory, cursor, and predatory; while Dr. Kenrick pronounces the o in armour and armory like the o in open, and the same letter in pillory, allegory, and cursor, like the o in or, nor, &c. This diversity among good judges can arise from nothing but the same uncertainty of the sound of this letter that we have just observed of the e; but, if we narrowly watch our pronunciation, we shall find that the unaccented o may be opened and lengthened, in deliberate speaking, without hurting the ear, which is not always the case with e; and this has induced me generally to separate the o from the succeeding r, when immediately following the accent; though I am sensible that the rapidity of colloquial speaking often reduces it to short u without offending the ear: but, when the o is removed more than one syllable from the accent, the most deliberate speaking generally lets it slide into the other vowel; for which reason I have commonly marked it in this manner. See Command.

558. It may, perhaps, appear to some of my readers, that too much time has been spent upon these nice distinctions of sound, in which judges themselves are found to disagree; but, when we consider how many syllables in the language are unaccented, and that these syllables are those in which the peculiar delicacy of the pronunciation of natives consists; when we reflect on the necessity of having as distinct and permanent sounds as possible, to which we may refer these fleeting and evanescent ones, we shall not look upon an attempt to arrest and investigate them as a useless part of philology.

ENGLISH SOUNDS.

FRENCH SOUNDS

1. â. The long slender English a, as in fâte, pâ-per, &c. (73.) é in fée, épée.
2. à. The long Italian a, as in fâr, fâ-ther, pa-pâ, mam-mâ (77.) a in fable, rable.
3. â. The broad German a, as in fâll, wâll, wâ-ter (83.) â in âge, Châlons
4. â. The short sound of the Italian a, as in fât, mât, mâr-ry (81.) a in fat, matin.
1. ê. The long e, as in mê, hêre, mê-tre, mê-dium (93.) i in mitre, épître.
2. è. The short e, as in mêt, lêt, gêt (95.) e in mette, nette.
1. î. The long diphthongal i, as in plne, tî-tle (105.) ai in latque, naïf.
2. î. The short simple i, as in pln, tî-tle (107.) i in inné, titré.
1. ô. The long open o, as in nô, nôte, nô-tice (162.) o in globe, lobe.
2. ô. The long close o, as in môve, prôve (164.) ou in mouvoir, pouvoir.
3. ô. The long broad o, as in nôr, fôr, ôr; like the broad â (167.) o in or, for, encon
4. ô. The short broad o, as in nôt, hôt, gôt (163.) o in hotte, cotte.
1. û. The long diphthongal u, as in tûbe, cûbe, Cû-pid (171.) ou in Cioutat, chiourme.
2. û. The short simple u, as in tûb, cûp, sûp (172.) eu in neuf, veuf.
3. û. The middle or obtuse u, as in bûll, fûll, pûll (173.) ou in boule, foule, poule.
- 3î. The long broad ô, and the short î, as in ôîl (299.) oi in cyclotide, hérotique
- ôâ. The long broad ô, and the middle obtuse û, as in thôû, pôûnd (313.) aoti in Aoite.

Th. The acute or sharp th, as in think, thin. (466.)

TH. The grave or flat th, as in this, that. (41.) (50.) (469.)

560. When g is printed in the Roman character, it has its hard sound in get, gone, &c.; as go, give, geese, &c.: when it has its soft sound, it is spelled in the notation by the consonant j; as giant, ginger, ji-ant jin-ger. The same may be observed of s: the Roman character denotes its hard sound in sin, sum &c.; as so, sil, sense, &c.: its soft sound is spelled by z; as rose, raise, &c., roze, raze, &c.

ADVERTISEMENT.

In the course of a critical investigation of the powers of the letters in the foregoing Principles, there is scarcely a word, of any difficulty or diversity of sound, which has not been noticed, and the true pronunciation, with the reasons and authorities for it, pointed out; so that, if the inspector should not meet with sufficient information in the Dictionary under the word, let him consult the Principles under the vowel, diphthong, or consonant, he wishes to be explained, and it is highly probable he will meet with the satisfaction he requires. Thus, to know something more concerning the g in the word impugn, which some speakers pronounce and others suppress, let him look into the Principles under the letter G, No. 386, and he will find additional observations to those in the Dictionary under the word. It is true, that most of these doubtful, as well as other words, are referred to the Principles; but, if this reference should by chance be omitted, it is hoped that this Advertisement will supply the deficiency.

APPENDIX.

THE Appendix in the third edition being incorporated into the present, no place could be found for the following class of words of the termination in ose, which are so variously accented by our lexicographers; but which, from their form and derivation, ought certainly to be pronounced alike. This will evidently appear from the following sketch:

The variety of accentuation, which this sketch exhibits, sufficiently shows how uncertain are our dictionaries where usage is obscure. From the decided prevalence of the accent on the last syllable of these words, we may easily guess at the analogy of pronunciation, and, with very little hesitation, determine that the accent ought to be placed on the last syllable of them all

DICTIONARY.]

CONCLUSION.

THUS, after many years of labour and anxious observation, a great part of which has been bestowed on this Dictionary, I have given many additional corrections and improvements to a fourth edition of it. The favourable reception it has met with from the Publick demands my warmest acknowledgements, but at the same time makes me regret the diminished value of the former editions, from the various corrections and improvements in this ; but the judicious and candid observer will acknowledge, that a work comprehending such an infinite number of nice distinctions, and minute particulars, which (as Dr. Lowth observes) often escape observation when they are most obvious, would naturally admit of several corrections and amendments in future editions. I have dissembled no difficulty ; I have stifled no objection ; and have sometimes chosen to risk the appearance of uncertainty and indecision, to those who are easily imposed upon by confidence and self-sufficiency, rather than hazard the opinion of the judicious few, by deciding without adequate reasons : and this edition, the result of much fatigue and anxiety, has, I flatter myself, fewer faults than any similar work of the same delicacy, extent, and complexity. With thankfulness, therefore, to God, who has supported me through the whole of it, I once more consign it to the candid and discerning Publick.

CRITICAL PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY,

UNITED.

The figures refer to the numbers in the PRINCIPLES OF PRONUNCIATION prefixed to this Dictionary, where the different sounds of the letters are explained at large. Thus 73 refers to the first sound of the letter A; 93 to the first sound of the letter E; and so of the rest.

The figures over the letters refer to the vowels in the words at the top of the page; and the index [P] before these words refers to the Table of Simple and Diphthongal Sounds, where the different sounds of the vowels are exhibited at one view. Thus [P] 559 refers to the Table in page 50.

[P] 559.—Fâte 73, fâr 77, fâll 83, fât 81;—mê 93, mêt 95;—pline 105, pln, 107;—nô 162, môte 164, nôr 167, nôt 163;—tûbe 171, tâb 172, bûll 173;—ôll 299;—pôând 313;—thin 466, thîs 469.

A HAS, in the English language, regularly only two sounds peculiar to itself, a short and a long one; all other sounds being irregular; and those of a are various, according to its combination with other letters. The broad sound, resembling that of the German a, is found in many of our monosyllables, as all, wall, malt, salt; in which a is pronounced as au in cause, or aw in law. A open, not unlike the a of the Italians, is found, Dr. Johnson says, in father, rather, and more obscurely in fancy, fast, &c. This pronunciation is indeed found in rath, but not in its derivative rather, the a of which is usually uttered as in fancy. A slender, or close, is the peculiar a of the English language, resembling the sound of the French e masculine, or diphthong ai in pais, or perhaps a middle sound between them, or between the a and e; to this the Arabick a is said nearly to approach; as in the words place, face, waste, and all those that terminate in ation; as, relation, nation, generation. A is also, in some words, transient and unobserved, as in the last syllables of carriage and marriage; in others less faintly sounded, as in those of captain and chaplain; and in some obscurely uttered, as in collar, jocular. A, an article set before nouns of the singular number; a man, a tree. Before words beginning with a vowel and h mute, it is written an; as, an ox, an egg, an honour, an habitual practice. A is sometimes a noun; as, a great A. A is placed before a participle, or participial noun; and is considered as a contraction of at; as, I am a walking. It also seems to be anciently contracted from at, when placed before local surnames; as Thomas a Becket. In other cases it seems to signify to; and in some cases it signifies in. A, prefixed to many, or few, implies one whole number; as, Told of a many thousand warlike French Shaks. A has a peculiar signification, denoting the proportion of one thing to another; as, The landlord hath a hundred a year. In burlesque poetry, it lengthens out a syllable, without adding to the sense; as, line-3, rhyming to China. Dryden. A is sometimes corruptly put for he; as, will a come? for will he come? It is also a barbarous corruption for have. A, in composition, seems to have sometimes the power of the French à in these phrases, à droit, à gauche, &c. and sometimes to be contracted from at, Dr. Johnson says; as, aside, aslope, afoot, asleep, atfirst, awake. Yet some of these are not so contracted. They are the same as on side, on foot, on sleep. So adays was formerly written on days; aboard, on board. There are words of which the a is become so component a part as not to be displaced; as, afresh, alive, aloud, anew; but it is redundant in arise, arouse, awake. A, in abbreviations, stands for artium, or artis; as, A. B. bachelor of arts, artium baccalaureus; A. M. master of arts, artium magister; or anno; as, A. D. anno domini. A, with the addition of the two Latin words per se, meaning by itself, is used by our elder writers to denote a namesuch. It may have been adopted from the custom of the child's school, in which every letter, we may presume, was taught to be expressed per se.

[P] A. 73. The change of the letter a into an before a vowel or mute h for the sake of sound, seems to deserve more attention than has generally been given to it by any of our grammarians, and will therefore be considered under the article An; which see.

Of the Alphabetical Pronunciation of the Letter A.

So many profound and ingenious observations have been made upon this first step to literature, that volumes might be filled with the erudition that has been lavished on this letter alone. The priority of place it claims, in all alphabets, has made it so much the object of attention, that philologists suppose the foundation of learning but weakly laid till the natural and civil history of the first letter be fully settled.

But, however deep have been their researches into the origin of this letter, we find no author in our language has hitherto attempted to settle the disputes that have arisen between the natives of England, Ireland, and Scotland, about the true sound of it, when called by its name. Instead, therefore, of tracing this character through the circles of Gomer, the Egyptian Hieroglyphicks, the mysterious Abxaras, or the Irish Ogham, I shall endeavour to obviate a difficulty that frequently arises when it is pronounced in the Hornbook; or, in other words, to inquire what is the true name of the first letter of the English alphabet—whether we are to say Aye, B, C; Ah, B, C; or Aw, B, C.

And first, it will be necessary to consider the nature of a vowel; which grammarians are generally agreed in defining to be “a simple articulate sound, formed by the impulse of the voice by the opening only of the mouth in a particular manner.” Now, as every vowel by itself is sounded long, as nothing but its junction with a consonant can make it otherwise, it is natural, when pronouncing this vowel alone, to give it the long open sound; but as this long open sound is threefold, as heard in face, father, and water, a question arises, which of these long sounds shall we adopt as a common name to the whole species of this letter? The English make choice of the a in face, the Irish of that in father, and the Scotch of that in water. Each party produces words where the letter a is sounded in the manner they contend for; but when we demand why one should have the preference, the controversy is commonly at an end; any farther reasons are either too remote or too insignificant to be produced: and indeed, if a diversity of names to vowels did not confound us in our spelling, or declaring to each other the component letters of a word, it would be entirely needless to enter into so trifling a question as the mere name of a letter; but when we find ourselves unable to convey signs to each other on account of this diversity of names, and that words themselves are endangered by an improper utterance of their component parts, it seems highly incumbent on us to attempt a uniformity in this point, which, insignificant as it may seem, is undoubtedly the foundation of a just and regular pronunciation.

The first rule for naming a letter, when pronounced alone, seems to be this: Whatever sound we give to a letter when terminating a syllable, the same sound ought to be given to it when pronounced alone; because, in both cases, they have their primary, simple sound, uninfluenced by a succeeding vowel or consonant; and therefore, when we pronounce a letter alone, it ought to have such a sound as does not suppose the existence of any other letter. But wherever a terminates a syllable with the accent upon it, (the only state in which it can be said to be pure), it has always the English sound of that letter. The only exceptions to this rule are, the words fa-ther, ma-ster, and wa-ter; and that these are merely exceptions, appears from the uniformity with which the a is pronounced otherwise in parent, papal, taper, fatal, &c. The other vowels have their names exactly similar to the sound they have in a similar situation, as the e like that in me-grim, the i like the i in title; the o as the o in no-ble, and the u like the u in tu-tor. Thus, as it appears from the general analogy of pronunciation, that the sound of the a, which the English adopt, is the only one that does not necessarily suppose the existence of any other sound, it inevitably follows, that theirs only is the proper appellation of that letter.

But there is another analogy by which we may determine the true sound of the vowels when pronounced singly; and that is, the sound they have when preserved long and open by the final e. Thus we call the letter e by the sound it has in theme, the letter i as it sounds in time, the letter o as heard in tone, and the u as in tune; and why the letter a should not be pronounced as heard in face, cannot be conceived; as each of the other vowels has, like a, a variety of other sounds, as they are united with letters which, in some measure, alter their quality.

In consequence of entertaining a different idea of the a, when pronounced in the alphabet, we see the natives of Ireland very prone to a different pronunciation of the words where this letter occurs; and, indeed, it is quite consistent with their doctrine of the sound of a, that the words parent, papal, taper, and fatal, should be pronounced pah-rent, pah-pal, tah-per, and fah-tal. We find the Scotch likewise inclinable to the same pronunciation of a when in words, as when alone. Thus we hear Savitan for Satan, sacred for sacred, and law-ity for laity; and this is perfectly consistent with the manner in which they pronounce the letter a, when alone: there is no medium. If this be not the true pronunciation of these words, the a is certainly to be sounded as the English do: for, whenever the English give the Italian sound, as it may be called, to the a, except in the words father and master, it is always in consequence of its junction with some consonant, which determines it to that sound; as in monosyllables terminating in r, as bar, car, far; but where it is not affected by a succeeding consonant, as in the words parent, papal, natal, fatal, we then hear it pronounced as the slender English a, both in and out of composition.

It will, perhaps, be objected, that the most frequent short sound of a, as heard in cat, rat, mat, carry, marry, parry, is the short sound of the Italian a in father, car, mar, par, and not the short sound of the a in care, mare, and pare: but it may be answered, that this want of correspondence between the name of the letter, and the most frequent short sound, is common to the rest of the vowels: for the o, as heard in cot, not, rot, is not the short sound of the o in coat, note, wrote, but of the a in water, or of the diphthongs in caught, naught, and wrought; and if we ought to call the a, ah, because its short sound corresponds to ah, for the very same reason we ought to call the o, au; and a similar alteration must take place with the rest of the vowels. As therefore, from the variety of sounds the vowels have, it is impossible to avoid the inconvenience of sometimes sounding the letter one way in a syllable, and another way in a word, we must either adopt the simple long sound when we would pronounce the letter alone, or invent new names for every different sound in a different word, in order to obviate the difficulty.

It must not be dissembled, however, that the sound of a, when terminating a syllable not under the accent, seems more inclined to the Irish than the English a, and that the ear is less disgusted with the sound of Ah-mer-i-cah than of A-mer-i-cay: but to this it may be answered, that letters not under the accent, in a thousand instances deviate from their true sound; that the vowel a, like several other vowels in a final syllable not accented, has an obscure sound, bordering on u. But if the a, in this situation, were pronounced ever so distinctly, and that this pronunciation were clearly the a in father, it would be nothing to the purpose: when the a is pronounced alone, it may be said not only to be a letter, but a distinct character, and a noun substantive; and, as such, has the same force as the letters in an accented syllable. The letter a, therefore, as the first character in the alphabet, may always be said to have the accent, and ought to have the same long, open sound, as is given to that letter when accented in a syllable, and not influenced in its sound by any preceding or succeeding consonant.

We may therefore conclude, that if all vowels, when pronounced alone, are accented and long, if spelling be the pronunciation of letters alone, (as it would be absurd to suppose ourselves acquainted with the different consonants that determine the sound of the vowels before they are pronounced,) it follows, that in spelling, or repeating the component parts of a word, we ought to give those parts their simple and uncombined sound. But there is no uncombined sound of the vowel a, except the slender sound contended for, unless in the words father and master; and therefore, when we repeat letters singly, in order to declare the sound of a word, we must undoubtedly give the first letter of the alphabet the sound we ever give it in the first syllable of the numerous class la-dy, pa-gan, ma-son, ba-sin, &c.

Thus, after placing every objection in its strongest light, and deducing our arguments from the simplest and clearest principles, this important question seems at last decided in favour of the English; who, independent of the arguments in their favour, may be presumed to have a natural right to determine the name of the letter in question, though it has been so often litigated by their formidable and learned, though junior, relations. For though, in some cases, the natives of Ireland and Scotland adhere rather more closely to analogy than the English themselves, yet in this we find the English pronounce perfectly agreeable to rule; and that the slender pronunciation of the letter a, as they pronounce it in the alphabet, is no more than giving it that simple sound it ever has, when unconnected with vowels or consonants that alter its power. W.

ABSCISS*, âb'-sîs, or ABSCISSA, âb-sîs'-sâ. n. s. [Lat.] Part of the diameter of a conic section, intercepted between the vertex and a semi-ordinate. Bp. Berkeley.

ABSCISSION, âb-sîzh'-ûn. n. s. [abscissio, Lat.] The act of cutting off. Wiseman. The act of disannulling. Bp. Taylor. The state of being cut off. Brown.

I have differed from Mr. Sheridan in marking the ss in this word; and, I think, with the best usage on my side. Though double s is almost always pronounced sharp and hissing, yet when a sharp s precedes, it seems more agreeable to the ear to pronounce the succeeding s flat. Thus, though the termination ition is always sharp, yet, because the s in transition is necessarily sharp, the t goes into the flat sound, as if written transhition, which see. W.

To ABSCOND, âb-skônd'. v. a. [abscondo, Lat.] To conceal. Hewyt.

To ABSCOND, âb-skônd'. v. n. To hide one's self. Ray.

ABSCONDER, âb-skôn'-dêr. n. s. He that absconds.

ABSENCE, âb'-sêns. n. s. The state of being absent, opposed to presence. Shak. Want of appearance, in the legal sense. Ayliffe. Inattention; neglect of the present object. Addison.

ABSENT, âb'-sênt. 492. a. [absens, Lat.] Not present in mind; inattentive. Addison.

To ABSENT, âb-sênt'. v. a. To forbear to come into presence. Shak.

ABSENTA NEOUS, âb-sên-tâ'-nê-ûs. a. Relating to absence; absent. Dict.

ABSENTEE, âb-sên-tê'. n. s. He that is absent from his station. Sir John Davies.

ABSENTER*, âb-sên-tôr. n. s. He that is absent from his duty. Ld. Ch. Thurlow.

ABSENTMENT*, âb-sên-t'mênt. n. s. The state of being absent. Barrow.

ABSENTHIAN*, âb-sîn'-thê-ân. a. [from absinthium.] Of the nature of wormwood. Randolph.

ABSENTHIATED, âb-sîn'-thê-â-têd. part. Impregnated with wormwood. Dict.

ABSOLUTENESS, âb-sô-lûte-nêss. n. s. Completeness or perfection. Bp. Rust. Freedom from dependance, or limits. Clarendon. Despotism. Bacon.

ABSOLUTION, âb-sô-lû'-shôn. n. s. Acquittal. Ayliffe. The remission of sins. South. Delivery pronunciation. B. Jonson.

ABSOLUTORY, âb-sôl'-û-tûr-rê. a. That which absolves. Ayliffe.

In the first edition of this [Walker's] Dictionary, I followed the accentuation of Johnson and Ash in this word, and placed the stress upon the first syllable, contrary to what I had done some years before in the Rhyming Dictionary, where I had placed the accent on the second, and which was the accentuation adopted by Mr. Sheridan. Upon a nearer inspection of the analogies of the language, I find this the preferable mode of marking it, as words in this termination, though very irregular, generally follow the stress of the corresponding noun or verb; and consequently this word ought to have the same accent as absolve, which is the more immediate relation of the word in question, and not the accent of absolute, which is the most distant. 512. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Entick, and Nares, have not inserted this word; and Mr. Perry very improperly accents it upon the third syllable. W.

ABSONANT[§], âb'-sô-nânt. 544. a. [See Absonous.] Contrary to reason; wide from the purpose. Quarles.

ABSONOUS, âb'-sô-nûs. a. [absonus, Lat.] Absurd; contrary to reason. Glanville. Unmusical, or untunable. Fotherby.

Dr. Johnson tells us, that this word was anciently and properly accented on the first syllable, though now frequently on the second. That it was accented on the first syllable till within these few years, is pretty generally remembered; and if Shakspeare did not, by poetical license, violate the accentuation of his time, it was certainly pronounced so two centuries ago, as appears by Dr. Johnson's quotation of him:

"Our court shall be a little academy,
"Still and contemplative in living arts."
Love's Labour Lost.

And in Ben Jonson's New Inn we find the same accentuation:

"Every house became "An academy of honour, and those parts
"We see departed."

But the accentuation of this word formerly, on the first syllable, is so generally acknowledged, as not to stand in need of poetical authority. The question is, whether this accentuation, or that which places the stress on the second syllable, is the most proper? To wave, therefore, the authority of custom, which precludes all reasoning on language, and reduces the dispute to a mere matter of fact, it may be presumed that whatever is agreeable to the most general usage of the language in similar words, is the most proper in this; and if it appears that general usage, in similar words, is in favour of the old pronunciation, it must certainly, for that reason, be allowed to be the best. And first it may be observed, that as our language is almost as averse to the accent on the last syllable, as the Latin, it is a general custom with us, when we adopt a word from the Latin, and abridge it of one or two of its syllables, to remove the accent at least a syllable higher than it was in the original language, that the accent, when the word is naturalized, may not rest on the last. Thus of Hómérus, we make Hómer; of Virgilius, Virgil; and of Horátius, Hórace: Hyacínthus, altered to Hyacínth, removes the accent two syllables higher; and cæremónia, become céremony, does the same; and ne law, that I know of, forbids us to accent academia, or, if you will, Ακαδημία, when turned into academy, on the first syllable, as it was constantly accented by our ancestors; who, receiving Greek through the medium of Latin, generally pronounced Greek words according to the Latin analogy, and therefore necessarily placed the accent of academia on the third syllable, which, when reduced to academy, required the accent to be removed higher.

But how, it will be said, does this account for placing the accent on the first syllable of the English word academy, rather than the second? To this it may be answered, that the numberless instances of preference given by the accent to the first syllable in similar words, such as melancholy, parsimony, dilatatory, &c. might be a sufficient authority without any other reason. But, perhaps, it will be pardoned me if I go farther, and hazard a supposition, that seems to account for the very common practice of placing the accent of so many of the longer polysyllables from the Latin on the first or second syllable. Though in the Latin there never was more than one accent upon a word, yet, in our pronunciation of Latin, we commonly place an accent on alternate syllables, as in our own words: and when the Latin word, by being anglicised, becomes shorter, the alternate accent becomes the principal. Thus, in pronouncing the Latin word academia, the English naturally place an accent on the first and third syllables, as if divided into âc-â-dé-mi-a; so that when the word becomes anglicised into âc-â-dé-my, the first syllable retains the accent it had when the word was Latin. On the other hand, it may be conjectured with some probability, that a fondness for pronouncing like the French has been the occasion of the alteration. As the English ever suppose the French place the accent on the last syllable, in endeavouring to pronounce this word after their manner, the stress must naturally fall on the second and last syllables, as if divided into a-câd-a-mie; and from an imitation of this, it is probable, the present pronunciation of the word was produced. Thus we have a very probable reason why so many of our longer words from the Latin are accented so near the beginning; as, in this mode of pronouncing them, they seem to retain one of the accents of the original. Hence the long train of words, voluntary, comparable, disputable, admirable, &c. have the accent on the first syllable, because, in pronouncing the words voluntarius, comparabilis, disputabilis, admirabilis, &c. we commonly lay a stress upon the first, as well as the third syllable. As to the analogy, as Mr. Sheridan pretends, of pronouncing this word with the accent on the second syllable, because words ending in my have the accent on the antepenultimate, nothing can be more ill-founded. True it is, that words of this termination never have the accent on the penultimate; but that, for this reason, they must necessarily have the accent on the antepenultimate, I cannot well comprehend. If polygamy, economy, astronomy, &c. 513 have their accent on the antepenultimate, it arises from the nature of the terminations; which being, as it were, a species, and applicable to a thousand other words, have, like logy and graphy, the accent always on the preceding syllable; which seems best to unite the compound into one word: but academy, being a simple, is subject to no such rule, and seems naturally to incline to a different analogy of pronunciation. Thus Dr. Johnson seems to have decided justly in saying the word academy ought to have the accent on the first syllable; though present usage, it must be confessed, seems to lead to the contrary pronunciation. W.

⚡ Within these twenty years this word has shifted its accent from the second to the first syllable. There are now few polite speakers, who do not pronounce it ac-ceptable; and it is much to be regretted that this pronunciation is become so general; for where consonants of so different an organ as p and t are near the end of a word, the word is pronounced with much more difficulty when the accent is removed higher, than when it is arrested by these letters; for, in this case, the force which accompanies the accent facilitates the organs in their transition from the formation of the one letter to the other. As nature, therefore, directs us to place the accent upon these consonants in all words ending in active, active, ictive, active, and active; active, ictible, ictible, and ictible; so we ought to listen to the same voice in pronouncing acceptable, susceptible, corruptible, with the accent on the second syllable. See COM-MENDABLE. W.

ADVERTISEMENT, âd-vêr-tîze'-mênt. } struction; admonition. Shak. Intelligence; information. Sir John Davies. Notice of any thing published in a paper; legal notification. Const and Canon Eccl.

As nouns ending in ment always follow the accentuation of the verbs from which they are formed, we frequently hear advertisement taxed with the grossest irregularity for having the accent on a different syllable from advertise.—The origin of this irregularity seems to have arisen from a change which has taken place in the pronunciation of the verb since the noun has been formed; advertise and chastise were, in Shakespeare's time, both accented on the penultimate, and therefore advertisement and chastisement were formed regularly from them.

"Wherein he did the King his lord advertise."

Hen. VIII

"My grief cries louder than advertisement."

Much Ado, &c.

"Oh, then how quickly should this arm of mine

"Now pris'n'er to the palsy, chastise thee."

Richard II.

"And chastisement doth therefore hide its head."

Jul. Cesar.

But since that time, the verbs advertise and chastise have fallen into an analogy more agreeable to verbs of the same form; for the verbs to promise, practise, franchise, mortise, and divertise, are the only words where the termination ise has not the accent either primary or secondary; and if an alteration must be made to reconcile the pronunciation of the simple with that of the compound, we should find it much easier to change advertisement and chastisement into advertisement and chas- tisement, than advertise and chastise into advertise and chastise; but the irregularity seems too inveterate to admit of any alteration. W.

- To A/LIENATE, âl'-yèn-âte. v. a. To transfer property to another. Bacon. To withdraw the heart or affections. Hooker.
- ☞ There is a strong propensity in undisciplined speakers to pronounce this word with the accent on the e in the penultimate; but this cannot be too carefully avoided, as all the compounds of alien have invariably the accent on the first syllable. But whether the a in this syllable be long or short, is a dispute among our best orthoëpists. Mr. Perry, Mr. Buchanan, W. Johnston, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Elphinston, join it with the consonant, and make it short; but Mr. Sheridan separates it from the l, and makes it long and slender: and though Mr. Elphinston's opinion has great weight with me, yet I here join with Mr. Sheridan against them all; not only because I judge his pronunciation of this word the most agreeable to the best usage, but because it is agreeable to an evident rule which lengthens every vowel with the accent on it, except i when followed by a single consonant and a diphthong. See Principles, No. 505, 534.

¶ A few years ago there was an affectation of pronouncing this word, when a noun, with the accent on the first syllable; and this had an appearance of precision, from the general custom of accenting nouns in this manner, when the same word, as a verb, had the accent on the last, 492; but a closer inspection into the analogies of the language showed this pronunciation to be improper, as it interfered with a universal rule, which was, to pronounce the y like e in a final unaccented syllable. But whatever was the reason of this novelty, it now seems to have subsided; and this word is now generally pronounced with the accent on the second syllable, as it is uniformly marked by all the orthoëpists in our language. See SURVEY. W.

 This word is divided into three syllables by Mr. Sheridan, and but into two by Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, Mr. Scott, and W. Johnston. The latter is, in my opinion, preferable. My reason is, that though this plural word is perfectly Latin, and in that language is pronounced in three syllables; yet, as we have the singular aloe in two syllables, we ought to form the plural according to our own analogy, and pronounce it in two syllables likewise.—See ANTIPODES. W.

 § The first syllable of this word, and of the sixteen [25] that follow it, except [altēa] and [although], are subject to a double pronunciation, between which it is not very easy to decide. There is a general rule in the language, that t, followed by another consonant, gives the preceding a its broad sound, as in salt. This rule is subject to several exceptions, 84; and if we take in these words into the exceptions, there is some doubt of the exceptions becoming the general rule. But the a in question is now so generally pronounced as in the first syllable of alley, valley, &c. that we should risk the imputation of inaccuracy to sound it otherwise. Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Scott, are uniformly for this latter sound of a. Mr. Perry marks all in the same manner, except altercate, and altercation; and W. Johnston has only the words altercation, and alternative, which he pronounces in the former manner. It is certain that the former was the true Anglo-Saxon sound, and it is highly probable that the latter has only obtained within these few years, in words obviously derived from the Latin, as these are; but there seems to be a grossness in one sound, and a neatness in the other, which has so decidedly given one of them the preference. W

AN, ân. art. The article indefinite, used before a vowel, or h mute. See A One. Locke. Any, or some. Pope. If Shakspeare.

Æ This indefinite, and, as it may be called, the euphonical article, is said by all our grammarians to be used before a vowel or h mute; but no notice is taken of using a instead of it before what is called a vowel, as a useful book, a useful ceremony, a usurer, &c. nor is any mention made of its constant usage before h when it is not mute, if the accent of the word be on the second syllable, as, an heroic action, an historical account, &c. This want of accuracy arises from a want of analyzing the vowels, and not attending sufficiently to the influence of accent on pronunciation. A proper investigation of the power of the vowels would have informed our grammarians, that the letter u, when long, is not so properly a vowel as a semi-consonant, and perfectly equivalent to commencing y, & that a feeling of this has insensibly influenced the best speakers to prefix a to it in their conversation, while a confused idea of the general rule, arising from an ignorance of the nature of the letters, has generally induced them to prefix an to it in writing. The same observations are applicable to the h. The ear alone tells us, that, before heroical, historical, &c. the an ought invariably to be used; but by not discovering that it is the absence of accent on the h that makes an admissible in these words, we are apt to prefix an to words where the h is sounded, as, an horse, an house, &c. and thus set our spoken and written language at variance. This seems better to account for the want of accuracy in this article than a conjecture I once heard from Dr. Johnson, that our ancestors, particularly in the time of the Spectator, where this misapplication of the article frequently occurs, did not pronounce the h at the beginning of words so often as we do. However this may be, it seems necessary to a correctness of language to make our orthography and pronunciation as consistent as possible: for which purpose it may not be useless to attend to the following general rules. The article A must be used before all words beginning with a consonant, and before the vowel w when long; and the article An must be used before all words beginning with a vowel, except long u; before words beginning with h mute, as, an hour, an heir, &c. or before words where the h is not mute, if the accent be on the second syllable, as, an heroic action, an historical account, &c. For the few words in our language where the h is mute, see this letter in the Principles, No. 394: and for a just idea of the letter u, and the reason why it admits of a before it, when long, see Principles, No. 8, and the notes upon it. W.

✠ We frequently hear disputes whether this word should be pronounced in four syllables, as it is here, with the accent on the second; or in three, as if divided into an-ti-podes, with the accent on the first syllable, and the last rhyming with abodes. To solve the difficulty, it must be observed, that the word is pure Latin; and that, when we adopt such words into our own language, we seldom alter the accent. If, indeed, the singular of this word were in use, like satellite, 155, then we ought to form the plural regularly, and pronounce it in three syllables only; but as it is always used in the plural, and is perfect Latin, we ought to pronounce it in four.

“To counterpoise this hero of the mode,
“Some for renown are singular and odd;
“What other men dislike is sure to please,
“Of all mankind, these dear antipodes:
“Through pride, not malice, they run counter still,
“And birth-days are their days of dressing ill.”

APOSTYLE, âp-pôs'-sl. 472, 405. n. s. [ἀπάστωλος.] A person sent with mandates by another. It is particularly applied to them whom our Saviour deputed to preach the Gospel. Shakspeare.

✠ This word is sometimes heard in the pulpit, as if divided into a-po-stle; the second syllable like the first of po-et. If the long quantity of the a, in the Latin apostolus, is urged for a similar length of the English apostle, let us only turn to No. 537 of the Principles, and we shall see the futility of arguing from the Latin quantity to ours. If these reasons are not satisfactory, it is hoped that those who are abettors of this singular pronunciation will alter e-pis-tle into e-pi-stle, the second syllable like pie, and then their reasoning and practice will be uniform. W.

APOSTLESHIP, â-pôs'-sl-shîp. n. s. The office of an apostle. Domne.

APOSTOLATE*, â-pôs'-tò-lâte. n. s. Apostleship. Killingbeck.

APOTHEOSIS §, à-pò-thè'-ò-sís. n. s. [ἀποθεώσις.] Deification. South.

✂ This word, like Metamorphosis, has deserted its Latin accentuation on the penultimate syllable, and returned to its original Greek accent on the antepenultimate. See Principles, No. 503, (d.) The other words of this termination, as Anadiplosis, Antipiosis, &c. retain the Latin accent, though all these words in Greek have the accent on the antepenultimate. This accentuation on the antepenultimate is so agreeable to the genius of our own tongue, that it is no wonder it is so prevalent. Johnson, Sheridan, Kenrick, Ash, Scott, Buchanan, Bailey, and Perry, have adopted it as I have done; and only Smith, Barclay, and Entick, accent the penultimate. So eminent a poet as Garth approves of the choice I have made, where he says,
"Allots the prince of his celestial line
"An apothecosis, and rites divine." W.

APOTHESIS*, à-pò-thè'-sís. n. s. [ἀπόθσις, Gr.] A place on the south side of the chancel, in the primitive churches, furnished with shelves, on which were books, vestments, &c. Sir G. Wheler.

ASPA'RAGUS, âs-pâr'-â-gûs. n. s. [ἀσπάραγος, Gr.] A plant. Miller.

⚡ This word is vulgarly pronounced Sparrongrass. It may be observed, that such words as the vulgar do not know how to spell, and which convey no definite idea of the thing, are frequently changed by them into such words as they do know how to spell, and which do convey some definite idea. The word in question is an instance of it; and the corruption of this word into Sparrongrass is so general, that asparagus has an air of stiffness and pedantry. See LANTERN. W.

A'SPECT, âs'-pêkt. n. s. [aspectus, Lat.] Look. Government of the Tongue. Countenance. Shak. Glance. Spenser. View; position. Milton. Relation. Locke. Disposition of a planet to other planets. Shakspeare.

⚡ This word, as a noun, was universally pronounced with the accent on the last syllable till about the middle of the seventeenth century. It grew antiquated in Milton's time, and is now entirely obsolete. Dr. Farmer's observations on this word, in his no less solid than ingenious Essay on The Learning of Shakspeare, are so curious, as well as just, that the reader will, I doubt not, be obliged to me for quoting them.

"Sometimes a very little matter detects a forgery. You may remember a play called the Double Falsehood, which Mr. Theobald was desirous of palming upon the world for a posthumous one of Shakspeare; and I see it is classed as such in the last edition of the Bodleian catalogue. Mr. Pope himself, after all the strictures of Scriblerus, in a letter to Aaron Hill, supposes it of that age; but a mistaken accent determines it to have been written since the middle of the last century.

"This late example
"Of base Henriquez, bleeding in me now,
"From each good aspect takes away my trust."

And in another place,

"I would you have an aspect, sir, of wondrous wisdom."

"The word aspect, you perceive, is here accented on the first syllable, which, I am confident, in any sense of it, was never the case in the time of Shakspeare; though it may sometimes appear to be so, when we do not observe a preceding elision.

"Some of the professed imitators of our old poets have not attended to this and many other minutia: I could point out to you several performances in the respective styles of Chaucer, Spenser, and Shakspeare, which the imitated bard could not possibly have either read or construed.

"This very recent hath troubled the annotators on Milton. Dr. Bentley observes it to be a tone different from the present use. Mr. Manwaring, in his Treatise of Harmony and Numbers, very solemnly informs us, that this verse is defective both in accent and quantity:

"His words here ended; but his meek aspect,
"Silent, yet spake!"

"Here, says he, a syllable is accented and long, whereas it should be short and graced!"

"And a still more extraordinary gentleman, one Green, who published a specimen of a new version of the Paradise Lost, into blank verse, by which that amazing work is brought somewhat nearer the summit of perfection, begins with correcting a blunder in the fourth book:

"The setting sun
"Slowly descended, and with right aspect—
"Levell'd his evening rays."

"Not so in the new version:

"Mean while the setting sun, descending slow—
"Levell'd with aspect right his evening rays."

"Enough of such commentators.—The celebrated Dr. Dee had a spirit, who would sometimes condescend to correct him, when peccant in quantity: and it had been kind of him to have a little assisted the weights above-mentioned.—Milton afflicted the antique; but it may seem more extraordinary, that the old accent should be adopted in Hudibras." W.

ğ This word is sometimes pronounced as if written authority. This affected pronunciation is traced to a gentleman, who was one of the greatest ornaments of the law, as well as one of the politest scholars of the age, and whose authority has been sufficient to sway the bench and the bar, though author, authentick, theatre, theory, &c. and a thousand similar words where the th is heard, are constantly starting them in the face.

The public ear, however, is not so far vitiated as to acknowledge this innovation; for, though it may, with security, and even approbation, be pronounced in Westminster Hall, it would not be quite so safe for an actor to adopt it on the stage.

I know it will be said, that autoritas is better Latin, that the purer Latin never had the h; and that our word, which is derived from it, ought, on that account, to omit it. But it may be observed, that, according to the best Latin critics, the word ought to be written autoritas, and that, according to this reasoning, we ought to write and pronounce authority and auctor; but this, I presume, is farther than these innovators would choose to go. The truth is, such singularities of pronunciation should be left to the lower order of critics; who, like coxcombs in dress, would be utterly unnoticed if they were not distinguished by petty deviations from the rest of the world. W.

Watts. A bar to mark the limits of any place. Bacon. A boundary. Pope.

✂ Pope, by the license of his art, pronounced this word in two syllables, with the accent on the last, as if written bar-rér:

"Twixt that and reason what a nice barrier!
"For ever seprate, yet for ever near."

Essay on Man, Ep. i. v. 215.

And yet, in another part of his works, he places the accent on the first syllable, as we always hear it in prose:

"Safe in the love of Heav'n, an ocean flows
"Around our realm, a barrier from the foes." W.

BA'RTON, bǎr'-trám. n. s. A plant. pellitory.

BA'RTON, bǎr'-è-tòne. n. s.

✂ A word with the grave accent on the last syllable. If the inspector does not know what is meant by the grave accent, it may be necessary to inform him, that writers on the Greek accent tell us, that every syllable which has not the acute accent, has the grave; and as there could but be one syllable accented in that language, the rest must necessarily be grave. What these accents are, has puzzled the learned so much, that they seem neither to understand each other nor themselves: but it were to be wished they had kept this distinction into acute and grave out of our own language, as it is impossible to annex any clear ideas to it, except we consider the grave accent merely as the absence of the acute, which reduces it to no accent at all. If we divide the voice into its two leading inflections, the rising and falling, and call the former the acute, and the latter the grave, we can annex distinct ideas to these words: and perhaps it is an ignorance of this distinction of speaking sounds, and confounding them with high and low, or loud and soft, that occasions the confusion we meet with in writers on this subject.—See Elements of Elocution, page 60: also Observations on the Greek and Latin Accent and Quantity, at the end of the Key to the Classical Pronunciation of Greek and Latin Proper Names. W.

Sharp prickles growing upon the ears of corn. Shak. A barb on an arrow. The beard of a horse is that part which bears the curb of the bridle. Furrier's Dict.

§ This word, as Dr. Kenrick observes, is frequently pronounced so as to rhyme with herd: but I am of his opinion, that this pronunciation is improper. Mr. Scott and Mr. Perry give it both ways. Buchanan sounds it short, like Mr. Sheridan. W. Johnston makes it rhyme with laird, a Scotch lord: but Mr. Elphinston, who is the most accurate observer of pronunciation I ever met with, gives it as I have done. The stage has, in my opinion, adopted the short sound of the diphthong, without good reason, and in this instance ought not to be followed; as the long sound is not only more agreeable to analogy, but to general usage. I am glad to find my opinion confirmed by so good a judge as Mr. Smith; and though the poets so often sacrifice pronunciation to rhyme, that their authority, in these cases, is not always decisive, yet, as Shakespeare says on another occasion,

"They still may help to thicken other proofs
"That do demonstrate thinly."

Othello.

"Rail'd at their covenant, and jeer'd
"Their reverend persons to my beard."

Hudibras.

"Some thin remains of chastity appear'd
"Ev'n under Jove, but Jove without a beard."

Dryden.

The impropriety of pronouncing this word as it is heard on the stage, will, perhaps, appear more perceptible by carrying this pronunciation into the compounds, as the false sound of great may be detected by the phrase Alexander the Great. 241.

"Old prophecies foretell our fall at hand,
"When bearded men in floating castles land.
"And as young striplings whip the top for sport,
"On the smooth pavement of an empty court,

"The wooden engine flies and whirls about,
"Admir'd with clamours of the beardless rout"

Dryden. W

§ The past time of this verb is by the English uniformly pronounced like the present. Nay, except in solemn language, the present, preterit, and participle, are exactly the same; while the Irish, more agreeably to analogy, as well as utility, pronounce the preterit as the noun bet, a wager; and this pronunciation, though contrary to English usage, is quite conformable to that general tendency observable in the preterit of irregular verbs, which is to shorten the vowel that is long in the present, as eat, eat, (often pronounced et); hear, heard; deal, dealt; mean, meant; dream, dreamt, &c. W.

TO BEAT, bête. v. n. To move in a pulsatory manner. Collier. To dash as a flood or storm. Dryden.

 ⚡ This word, in the solemn, as well as the familiar style, has shared the fate of most of those words, which, from their nature, are in the most frequent use. It is scarcely ever heard otherwise than as the noun bee, a repository for corn or wine, and must be placed among those deviations, which language is always liable to in such words as are auxiliary or subordinate to others; for, as those parts of bodies which are the most frequently handled grow the soonest smooth by constant friction, so such words as are in continual use seem to wear off their articulations, and become more irregular than others. So low as the age of James the First, I have seen this word spelled byn. W.

BIGOTED, big'-gût-êd. a. Irrationally zealous.
Garth.

☞ From what oddity I know not, this word is frequently pronounced as if accented on the last syllable but one, and is generally found written as if it ought to be so pronounced, the t being doubled, as is usual when a participle is formed from a verb that has its accent on the last syllable. Dr. Johnson, indeed, has very judiciously set both orthography and pronunciation to rights, and spells the word with one t, though he finds it with two in the quotations he gives us from Garth and Swift. That the former thought it might be pronounced with the accent on the second syllable, is highly presumable from the use he makes of it, where he says,

"Bigotted to this idol, we disclaim
 "Rest, health, and ease, for nothing but a name."

For if we do not lay the accent on the second syllable, here the verse will be unparadoxically rugged. This mistake must certainly take its rise from supposing a verb which does not exist, namely, as bigot; but as this word is derived from a substantive, it ought to have the same accent; thus, though the words ballot and billet are verbs as well as nouns, yet as they have the accent on the first syllable, the participial adjectives derived from them have only one t, and both are pronounced with the accent on the first syllable, as balloted, billeted.
Bigoted, therefore, ought to have but one t, and to preserve the accent on the first syllable. W.

BIGOTEDLY*, big'-gût-êd-lè. a. In the manner of a bigot; pertinaciously.

BILLIARDS, bil'-yûrdz. 113. n. s. Without a singular. [billard, Fr.] A game at which a ball is forced against another on a table. Shakspeare.

§ Mr. Nares has very judiciously corrected a false etymology of Dr. Johnson in this word, which might eventually lead to a false pronunciation. Dr. Johnson derives it from ball and yard, or stick to push it with. So Spenser—

“With shuttle-cocks, unseemingly manly wit.”

Spenser, says Mr. Nares, was probably misled, as well as the lexicographer, by a false notion of the etymology. The word, as well as the game, is French, billard, and made by the addition of a common termination, from bille, the term for the ball used in playing. W.

BIOGRAPHICAL*, bi-ôg'-grâf-è-kâl. a. Relating to biography. Warton.

BIOGRAPHY §, bi-ôg'-grâ-fè. 116, 518. n. s. [βίος and γραφω.] Writing the lives of men. Watts.

BIOVAC, bè-ô-vâk. } n. s. [Fr. from weydwacht, German, a double guard.]

BIOVAC, bè-ô-vâk. } A guard at night performed by the whole army. The warfare of recent times has often given occasion for the use of this word, or of the verb bivouac; as, the enemy bivouac- acked in front of our camp.

BIPAROUS, bip'-pâr-rûs. 503. a. [binus and pario, Lat.] Bringing forth two at a birth.

§ This word and bipedal have the i long in Dr. Ash and Mr. Sheridan; but Mr. Perry makes the i in the first long, and in the last short. Analogy, however, seems to decide in favour of the sound I have given it. For though the penultimate accent has a tendency to lengthen the vowel, when followed by a single consonant, as in biped, tripod, &c. the antepenultimate accent has a greater tendency to shorten the vowel it falls upon.—See BIGAMY and TRIPOD, 503. W.

BIPARTITE, bip'-pâr-tîe. 155. a. [binus and partior, Lat.] Having two correspondent parts. Glanville.

§ Every orthoëpist has the accent on the first syllable of this word, but Entick, who places it on the second; but a considerable difference is found in the quantity of the first and last i. Sheridan and Scott have them both long, Nares the last long, Perry both short, and Buchanan and W. Johnston as I have done it. The varieties of quantity on this word are the more surprising, as all these writers that give the sound of the vowels make the first i in tripartite short, and the last long; and this uniformity in the pronunciation of one word ought to have led them to the same pronunciation of the other, so perfectly similar. The shortening power of the antepenultimate accent is evident in both. 503. W.

BIPARTITION, bi-pâr-tîsh'-ân. n. s. The act of dividing into two.

BIPED, bi'-péd. 118. n. s. [bipes, Lat.] An animal with two feet. Brown.

BIPE TALOUS, bi-pè'-tâ-lûs. 118. a. [bis, Lat. and πεταλον.] Consisting of two flower leaves. Dict.

BIQUADRATE, bi-kwâ'-drâte. 91. } n. s. [In albi-quadra'tick, bi-kwâ'-drât'-îk. } gebra.] The fourth power, arising from the multiplication of a square by itself. Harris.

BIQUADRA'TICK, bi-kwâ'-drât'-îk. a. Relating to the fourth power in algebra.

BIRCH Tree §, bûrsh'-trê. [birce, Sax.] A tree with —nô, môve, nôr, nô; —tûbe, tûb báll; —ôll; —pôund; —tûn, THIS.

leaves like those of the poplar: the shoots are very slender. Müller.

BIRCH *Wine. Wine made of the vernal juice of birch. T. Warton.

BIRCHEN, bîr'-tshn. 103, 405. a. [bircene, Sax.] Made of birch. Beaumont and Fletcher.

✂ An Englishman may blush at this cluster of consonants for a syllable; and yet this is unquestionably the exact pronunciation of the word; and our language is full of these syllables without vowels.—See Principles, No. 103, 405. W.

BIRD ŷ, bîrd. 108. n. s. [bîrð, or bîrð, Sax.] A general term for the feathered kind. Shakspeare.

BISSE/XTILE, bîs-sêks'-tîl. 140. n. s. [bis and sex tîlis, Lat.] Leap year. Brown.

✂ Mr. Scott places the accent on the first syllable of this word; Dr. Kenrick on the first and last; Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Johnson, W. Johnston, Dr. Ash, Buchanan, Perry, Entick, and Bailey, on the second: Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, and W. Johnston, pronounce the last i long, as in tile. But as the accent is on the second syllable by so great a majority, analogy determines the last i to be short. W.

BIS/SON, bîs'-sûn. 166. a. [bîren, Sax.] Blind. Shakspeare.

BISTRE, bîs'-tûr. n. s. [Fr.] A colour made of chimney soot boiled, and then diluted with water; used by painters in washing their designs.

BITUMEN$, bê-tû-mên. 118, 503. n. s. [Lat.] A fat unctuous matter dug out of the earth, or scummed off lakes. Bacon.

[F] This word, from the propensity of our language to the antepenultimate accent, is often pronounced with the stress on the first syllable, as if written bit-u-men; and this last mode of sounding the word may be considered as the most common, though not the most learned pronunciation. For Dr. Ash is the only orthoëpist who places the accent on the first syllable; but every one who gives the sound of the unaccented vowels, except Buchanan, very improperly makes the i long, as in idle; but if this sound be long, it ought to be slender, as in the second syllable of visible, terrible, &c. 117, 551. W.

BITUMINOUS, bê-tû-mê-nûs. 118. a. Having the nature of bitumen. Bacon.

☞ We sometimes hear this word pronounced with the accent on the second syllable, like blaspheme; and as the word blasphemus in Latin has the second syllable long, and the English word has the same number of syllables, it has as good a right to the accent on the second syllable, as sonorous, bitumen, acumen, &c.; but placing the accent on the first syllable of blasphemus is by much the most polite; as, unfortunately for the other pronunciation, though a learned one, it has been adopted by the vulgar. 503. W.

BLA'SPHEMOUSLY, blás'-fẻ-mỏs-lẻ. ad. With wicked irreverence. Swift.

[F This word is pronounced four ways, bozum, buzum, and boozam, the oo like u in bull; and boozum, as ou in bouse. Sheridan and Scott adopt the third sound; Perry seems to mark the fourth; Dr. Kenrick has the second and fourth, but seems to prefer the former; and W. Johnston has the second; and that is, in my opinion, the most general: but the stage seems to have adopted the fourth sound, which has given it a currency among polite speakers, and makes it the most fashionable. Mr. Elphinstone, a nice observer, as well as a deep investigator, announces the second, but tells us that the third was the original pronunciation. W.

BOURN, bôrne. n. s. [borne Fr.] A bound a limit.
Shakspeare. A brook. Spenser.

✚ I have differed from Mr. Sheridan and Dr. Kenrick in the pronunciation of this word. They make it sound as if written bourn; but if my memory fail me not, it is a rhyme to mourn upon the stage, and Mr. Garrick so pronounced it:

"That undiscover'd country, from whose bourn

I am fortified in this pronunciation by the suffrages of

two pieces of wood laid arcbwise, to receive the upper part of a horse's back. Bow of a ship. That part of her which begins at the loof, and compass-ing ends of the stern, and ends at the sternmost parts of the fore-castle.

To BOW, bô. v. a. To bend sideways.

✚ While some words are narrowing and contracting their original signification, others are dividing and subdividing into a thousand different acceptations. The verb to bow, rhyming with cow, might originally signify flex-ure every way, and so serve for that action which made any thing crooked, let its direction be what it would:
but it appears certain, that at present it only means that flexure which is vertical, and which may be called a bowing down, but is by no means so applicable to that flexure which is sideways or horizontal, and for which necessity seems insensibly to have brought the verb I have inserted into use. This verb seems accompanied by the word out as the other is by down, and we may say such a thing bows down, but another thing bows out, or swells sideways; the first verb is pronounced so as to rhyme with cow, now, &c. and the last with go, no, &c. Milton seems to have used the word with this sound, where, in his Penseroso, he says—

"And love the high embowed roof,
"With antique pillars' massy proof."

But as nothing can tend more to the ambiguity of language than to have words spelled in the same manner sounded differently in order to distinguish their meaning by their pronunciation, I would humbly advise to spell the word bow, (to shoot with,) and the verb to bow (to bend sideways,) with the final e; this slight addition will relieve a reader from the embarrassment he is under at first sight, where he is not thoroughly acquainted with the circumstances of a relation, and does not know how to pronounce the word till he has read the context. For the propriety of this additional e, see the words Bowl and Form.

I cannot refrain from quoting Mr. Nares on this word, as his opinion has great authority:—"A bow for arrows,
"and to bow, when it signifies merely to bend any "thing, have ow like o long. This distinction I believe "to be right, though our great lexicographer has not "noticed it. He gives to bow, in every sense, the regu"lar sound of ow, (that is, rhyming with cow.) But of "this instance the first and fourth appear to be erro"neous; the third is doubtful; and in the second, the "word is used to express an inclination of the body, but "metaphorically applied to trees. See the four in"stances from Shakspeare, Dryden, and Locke, under
"To bow, v. a. No. 1."

A want of attending to the different ideas the word bow conveys, as it is differently sounded, has occasioned the inconsistent sea terms; the bow of a ship, rhyming with cow; and an anchor, called the best bower, rhyming with hour; and bow, in the word bowsprit, rhyming with go, no, &c. W.

BOWL §, bôle. n. s. [boule, Fr.] A round mass, which may be rolled along the ground. Shakespeare.

§ Many respectable speakers pronounce this word so as to rhyme with howl, the noise made by a dog. Dr. Johnson, Mr. Elphinstone, and Mr. Perry, declare for it; but Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Smith, pronounce it as the vessel to hold liquor, rhyming with hole. I remember having been corrected by Mr. Garrick for pronouncing it like howl; and am upon the whole of opinion, that pronouncing it as I have marked it is the preferable mode, though the least analogical. But as the vessel has indisputably this sound, it is rendering the language still more irregular to give the ball a different one. The inconvenience of this irregularity is often perceived in the word bow. To have the same word signify different things, is the fate of all languages; but pronouncing the same word differently to signify different things, is multiplying difficulties without necessity; for, though it may be alleged, that a different pronunciation of the same word to signify a different thing is, in some measure, remedying the poverty and ambiguity of language, it may be answered, that it is in reality increasing the ambiguity, by setting the eye and ear at variance, and obliging the reader to understand the context before he can pronounce the word. It may be urged, that the Greek and Latin languages had these ambiguities in words which were only distinguishable by their quantity or accent. But it is highly probable that the Greek language had a written accent to distinguish such words as were pronounced differently to signify different things, and this is equivalent to a different spelling; and though the Latin word lego signified either to read or to send, according to the quantity with which the first syllable was pronounced, it was certainly an imperfection in that language which ought not to be imitated. Ideas and combinations of ideas will always be more numerous than words; and therefore the same word will often stand for very different ideas; but altering the sound of a word without altering the spelling, is forming an unwritten language. W.

From the tendency we have to remove the accent to the beginning of such Latin words as we Anglicise by dropping the last syllable, we sometimes hear this word improperly accented on the first syllable.—See ACADEMY. The authorities for the accent on the second syllable are, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Johnson, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, Dr. Kenrick, Bailey, Dr. Ash, and Entick; Buchanan stands alone for the accent on the first. W.

✂ The general sound of this word is like the verb to buy; but we not unfrequently hear it pronounced like the verb to be. This latter sound, however, is only tolerable in colloquial pronunciation, and then only when used as a preposition; as when we say, Do you travel by land or by water? But in reading these lines of Pope,

"By land, by water, they renew the charge;

"They stop the chariot, and they board the barge"—

here we ought to give the word by the sound of the verb to buy; so that pronouncing this word like be, is, if the word will be pardoned me, a colloquialism. W.

 a distemperature of the humours, as hinders nutrition, and weakens the vital and animal functions.

Arbuthnot.

Mr. Sheridan is the only orthoëpist who accents this word on the first syllable, as I have done; and yet every other lexicographer, who has the word, accents ane- rezey, atazy, and artazazy, on the first syllable, except
 Mr. Sheridan, who accents anorezy, and Bailey atazy, on the penultimate.—Whence this variety and inconsistency should arise, it is not easy to determine. Or- thodoxy and apophony had sufficiently chalked out the analogy of accentuation in these words. The terminations in azy and ey do not form a species of words which may be called enclitical, like logy and graphy, 517, but seem to be exactly under the predicament of those Latin and Greek words, which, when adopted into English by dropping their last syllable, remove the accent at least two syllables higher.—See ACADEMY. W.

CACHINNA'TION, kâk-kîn-nâ'-shûn. 353. n. s. [ca-

CACOCY'MY, kâk'-kô-kîm-mè. n. s. [κακοχυμία.]
 A depravation of the humours from a sound state.

Arbuthnot.

Johnson and Bailey accent this word cacochymy, Sheridan and Buchanan cacochymy, and Dr. Ash cac- ochymy; and this last accentuation I have adopted for reasons given under the word cachezy—which see. W.

CAUSEY, káw'-zè. } n. s. [chassée, Fr.] A

CAUSEWAY, káwz'-wá. } way raised and paved above the rest of the ground. Milton.

Dr. Johnson tells us, that this word, by a false notion of its etymology, has been lately written causeway. It is derived from the French chassée. In the scripture we find it written causey.

"To Shuppim the lot came forth westward by the causey." 1 Chron. xxvi. 16.

But Milton, Dryden, and Pope, write it causeway; and these authorities seem to have fixed the pronunciation. This word, from its mistaken etymology, may rank with lantern—which see. W.

 other fish. Sir T. Herbert.

§ Either the spelling or the pronunciation of this word should be altered: we have no instance in the language of sounding ere; the ancient spelling seems to have been caviare; though Buchanan and Bailey, in compliance with the pronunciation, spell it caveer, and W Johnston, cavecar; and Ash, as a less usual spelling, cavier; but the Dictionary De la Crusca spells it caviare. W.

☞ Biped and quadruped are spelled in Johnson without the final e, while solipede, palmpede, plumipede, multipede, and centipede, retain it. The orthography in this case is of importance to the pronunciation; and therefore, as the words are of perfectly similar original, their spelling and pronunciation ought certainly to be alike. Biped and quadruped are the words most in use; and as they have omitted the final e, which there does not seem to be any reason to retain, we may infer, that the silent and insensible operation of custom has directed us to do the same by the rest of the words, and to pronounce the last syllable short.—See MILLEPEDES. W.

- ¶ I have in this word departed from Mr. Sheridan and Dr. Kenrick, because I think the best usage has entirely departed from them. About thirty years ago [i. e. about 1770] the first syllable of chamber was universally pronounced so as to rhyme with palm, psalm, &c., but since that time it has been gradually narrowing to the slender sound of a came, fame, &c., and seems now to be fully established in this sound. This, however, is to be regretted, as it militates with the laws of syllabication: there are few words in the language, which we cannot so divide into parts as to show by this division the quantity of the vowels; this word forms an exception; for mb being uncombinable consonants, we cannot end the first syllable with a; and if we join m to it, the a becomes short, and requires another sound. But if two such words as Cam and bridge could not resist the blind force of custom, which has for so many years reduced them to Camebridge, why should we wonder that chamber and cambrick, Tinnmouth and Yarmouth, should yield to the same unrelenting tyrant? W.

To CHAR, tshâre. v. n. To work by the day, without being a hired servant.

☞ "As the maid that milks,
"And does the meanest chares."—Shakspeare.

In Ireland they seem to have retained the genuine pronunciation of this, as well as many other old English words; I mean that which is agreeable to the orthography, and rhyming with tar. In England it is generally heard like chair, to sit on, and its compound, char-woman like chairwoman. Skinner, I know, admits that the word may be derived from the Dutch keeren, to sweep; and Junius spells the word chare, and tells us the Saxons have the same word spelled cýrre, signifying business or charge; but, be its derivation what it will, either the orthography or the pronunciation ought to be altered; for, as it stands at present, it is a singular and disgraceful anomaly. W.

CHART §, kàrt, or tshàrt. [tshàrt, Perry & Jones.] n. s. [charta, Lat.] A delineation of coasts, for the use of sailors. Arbutnot.

§ As this word is perfectly anglicised, by cutting off the a in the Latin charta, and ns in the Greek χαρτης, we ought certainly to naturalize the initial letters by pronouncing them as in charter, charity, &c.; but such is our fondness for Latin and Greek originals, that we catch at the shadow of a reason for pronouncing after these languages, though in direct opposition to the laws of our own. Thus we most frequently, if not universally, hear this word pronounced as cart, a carriage, and perfectly like the French carte. W.

CHARTER*, See CARTEL.

CHARTER, tshàr'-tùr. n. s. [charta, Lat.] A written evidence. Any writing bestowing privileges or rights. Shak. Privilege; immunity. Shakspeare.

CHASTITY, tshàs-tè-tè. 511. n. s. [castitas, Lat.] Purity of the body. Shakspeare. Freedom from obscenity. Shakspeare. Freedom from bad mixture of any kind. Bp. Compton.

§ I have in this word departed from Mr. Sheridan, and several other speakers, in the sound of the a in the first syllable, as no analogy can be clearer than that which prevails in words of this termination, where the antepenultimate accent always shortens the vowel. Thus, though the a, e, and i, are long in humane, serene, and divine, they are short in humanity, serenity, and divinity; and unless custom clearly forbids, which I do not believe is the case, chastity ought certainly to have the a as I have marked it. W.

To CHAT, tshàt. v. n. [contracted from chatter.] To prate; to converse at ease. Spenser. Dryden.

To CHAT, tshàt. v. a. To talk of. Shakspeare.

 CHE/ERFUL, tshêr'-fûl, or tshêr'-fûl. a. Gay; full of life. Having an appearance of gayety. Proverbs. Causing cheerfulness. Phillips.
 F This word, like fearful, has contracted an irregular pronunciation, that seems more expressive of the turn of mind it indicates than the long open e, which languishes on the ear, and is not akin to the smartness and vivacity of the idea. We regret these irregularities, but they are not to be entirely prevented; and, as they sometimes arise from an effort of the mind to express the idea more forcibly, they should not be too studiously avoided; especially when custom has given them considerable currency; which I take to be the case with the short pronunciation of the present word. Mr. Sheridan and some other orthoëpists seem to adopt the latter pronunciation; and W. Johnston, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Perry, the former; and as this is agreeable to the orthography, and it may be added, to the etymology, (which indicates that state of mind which arises from being full of good cheer,) it ought, unless the other has an evident preference in custom, to be looked upon as the most accurate. 246, 247. W.

CHYMIST*, kîm'-mîst. n. s. A professor of chymistry. Pope.

§ Scholars have lately discovered, that all the nations of Europe have, for many centuries past, been erroneous in spelling this word with a y instead of an e; that is, chymist instead of chemist: and if we crave their reasons, they very gravely tell us, that, instead of deriving the word from χῆμος, juice, or from χύω, χύω, or χύω, to melt, it is more justly derived from the Arabic kema, black. But Dr. Johnson, who very well understood every thing that could be urged in favour of the new orthography, has very judiciously continued the old; and, indeed, till we see better reasons than have yet appeared, it seems rather to savour of an affectation of oriental learning than a liberal desire to rectify and improve our language. But let the word originate in the east or west, among the Greeks or Arabians, we certainly received it from our common linguaducts, (if the word will be pardoned me) the Latin and French, which still retain either the y, or its substitute i.

Besides, the alteration produces a change in the pronunciation, which, from its being but slight, is the less likely to be attended to; and therefore the probability is, that, let us write the word as we will, we shall still continue to pronounce the old way; for in no English word throughout the language does the e sound like y, or i short, when the accent is on it.

This improvement, therefore, in our spelling, would, in all probability, add a new irregularity to our pronunciation, already encumbered with too many. Warburton, in his edition of Pope's works, seems to have been the first writer of note who adopted this mode of spelling from Boerhaave and the German critics; and he seems to have been followed by all the inscriptions on the chymists' shops in the kingdom. But till the voice of the people has more decidedly declared itself, it is certainly the most eligible to follow Dr. Johnson and our established writers in the old orthography.—See Mr. Nares's English Orthoëpy, page 285, where the reader will see judiciously exposed the folly of altering settled modes of spelling for the sake of far-fetched and fanciful etymologies. W.

CIRCUMFLEX, sêr'-kûm-flèks. n. s. An accent used to regulate the pronunciation of syllables, including or participating the acute and grave. Holder.

☞ All our prosodists tell us, that the circumflex accent is a composition of the grave and the acute; or that it is a raising and falling of the voice upon the same syllable. If they are desired to exemplify this by actual pronunciation, we find they cannot do it, and only pay us with words. This accent, therefore, in the ancient as well as modern languages, with respect to sound, has no specific utility. The French, who make use of this circumflex in writing, appear, in the usual pronunciation of it, to mean nothing more than long quantity.—See BARTON.—If the inspector would wish to see a rational account of this accent, as well as of the grave and acute, let him consult a work lately published by the author of this [Walker's] Dictionary, called A Rhetorical Grammar, the third edition; or, A Key to the Classical Pronunciation of Greek and Latin Proper Names. W.

§ In scarcely any part of the language does the influence of accent on the sound of the vowels appear more perceptibly than in the prepositional syllables col, com, con, and cor. When the accent is on these syllables, in college, commissary, conclave, corrigible, &c. &c., the o has distinctly its short sound. The same may be observed of this o, when the principal accent is on the third syllable, and the secondary accent on the first, 523; as in colonnade, commendation, condescension, correspondent, &c. &c.; for in this case there is a secondary accent on the first syllable, which preserves the o in its true sound, 522: but when the accent is on the second syllable, this vowel slides into a sound like short u, and the words to collect, to commit, to convince, &c. &c., are heard as if written collect, cummit, cunvince, currupt, &c. &c. It is true, that, when these words are pronounced alone, with deliberation, energy, and precision, the o in the first syllable preserves nearly its true sound; but this seems to slide insensibly into short u the moment we unite these words with others, and pronounce them without premeditation. The deliberate and solemn sound is that which I have given in this [Walker's] dictionary: nor have I made any difference between words where the accent is on the second syllable: and why Mr. Sheridan, and those who have followed him, should, in combust, commute, complete, &c., give the sound of short o in from; and in command, commit, commence, &c., give the same letter the sound of short u in drum, I cannot conceive: they are all susceptible of this sound or none, and therefore should all be marked alike. If custom be pleaded for this distinction, it may be observed, that this plea is the best in the world when it is evident, and the worst when obscure. No such custom ever fell under my observation: I have always heard the first syllable of compare and compel, of commence and compose, pronounced alike, and have therefore made no distinction between them in this [Walker's] dictionary. I have given them all the sound of the o in commas; though I am sensible that, in colloquial pronunciation, they all approach nearer to the short u, and are similar to the same syllables in comfort, combat, &c. And it may be laid down as a general rule, without an exception, "that o in an initial syllable, immediately before the accent, and succeeded by two u combinable consonants, may, in familiar conversation, be pronounced like the same letter in come, done &c." W. manding; the order given. Dryden. The power of overlooking. Dryden.

☞ The propensity of the unaccented o to fall into the sound of short u is nowhere more perceptible than in the first syllables of words beginning with col, com, com, or cor, when the accent is on the second syllable. Thus thi o in to collect and college; in commend and comment; in connect and consul; in correct and corner, cannot be considered as exactly the same in all: the o in the first word of each of these pairs, has certainly a different sound from the same letter in the second; and if we appreciate this sound, we shall find it coincide with that which is the most nearly related to it, namely, the short u. I have not, however, ventured to substitute this u: not that I think it incompatible with the most correct and solemn pronunciation, but because, where there is a possibility of reducing letters to their radical sound, without hurting the ear, this radical sound ought to be the model, and the greater or less departure from it left to the solemnity or familiarity of the occasion. To foreigners, however, it may not be improper to remark, that it would be always better for them to adopt the u instead of o: this will secure them from the smallest impropriety, for natives only can seize such nice distinctions as sometimes divide even judges themselves. Mr. Sheridan was certainly of opinion, that this unaccented o might be pronounced like u, as he has so marked it in command, commence, commissio-, and commend, though not in commender; and in compare, though not in comparative: but in almost every other word, where this o occurs, he has given it the sound it has in constant. Mr. Scott has exactly followed Mr. Sheridan in these words, and Dr. Kenrick has uniformly marked them all with the short sound of o. Why Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Scott should make any difference in the first syllables of these words, where the letters and accents are exactly the same, I cannot conceive: these syllables may be called a species; and, if the occasion were not too trifling for such a comparison, it might be observed, that, as nature varies in individuals, but is uniform in the species, so custom is sometimes various in accented syllables, which are definitely and strongly marked, but commonly more regular in unaccented syllables, by being left, as it were, to the common operation of the organs of pronunciation. —See the words COLLECT and DOMESTICK. W.

COMME'NDABLE, kôm-mên-dâ-bl, or kôm-mên'-dâ-bl. a. Laudable; worthy of praise.

☞ This word, like acceptable, has, since Johnson wrote his dictionary, shifted its accent from the second to the first syllable. The sound of the language certainly suffers by these transpositions of accent. However, when custom has once decided, we may complain, but must still acquiesce. The accent on the second syllable of this word is grown vulgar, and there needs no other reason for banishing it from polite pronunciation. W.

COMME'NDABLENESS*, kôm-mên-dâ-bl-nês, or kôm-mênd'-â-bl-nês. n. s. State of being commendable.

To COMMERCE, kôm'-mêrse'. v. n. To traffick. Raleigh. To hold intercourse with. Habington.

✠ Milton has, by the license of his art, accented this verb according to the analogy of dissyllable nouns and verbs of the same form, 492:

"And looks commerring with the skies,

"Thy wrapt soul sitting in thy eyes."—Penseroso.

But this verb, like to comment, would, in prose, require the accent on the first syllable, as in the noun: though Akenside has taken the same liberty with this word as Milton had done with that:

"—the sober zeal

"Of age commenting on prodigious things."

Pleasures of Imagination. W.

COMMERICAL, kôm'-mêr'-shâl. a. Relating to commerce or traffick. Robertson.

COMMERCIALLY*, kôm'-mêr'-shâl-lê. ad. In a commercial way. Burke.

 § Dr. Kenrick says, this word is sometimes, but improperly, accented on the first syllable; but it may be observed, that this impropriety is become so universal, that not one, who has the least pretension to politeness, dares to pronounce it otherwise. It is, indeed, to be regretted, that we are so fond of Latin originals as entirely to neglect our own; for this word can now have the accent on the second syllable, only when it means one who confesses his crimes; a sense in which it is scarcely ever used. Mr. Sheridan and Entick have the accent on the first syllable of this word; Mr. Scott on the first and second; Dr. Johnson, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, W. Johnston, Ash, Bailey, and Smith, on the second; but, notwithstanding this weight of authority, the best usage is certainly on the other side. W.
CONFEST, kôn-fêst'. a. [A poetical word for confessed.] Open; known; acknowledged. Roué.
 § Dr. Kenrick tells us, that this is a poetical word for confessed; and, indeed, we frequently find it so written by Pope, and others:
 "This clue, thus found, unravels all the rest;
 "The prospect clears, and Clodio stands confest."
 But that this is a mere compliance with the prejudices of the eye, and that there is not the least necessity for departing from the common spelling, see Principles of English Pronunciation, No. 360. W.
CONFESTLY, kôn-fêst'-lê. 364. ad. Undisputably. Decay of Piety.
 § Properly, confessedly. W.
CONFIDANT, kôn-fê-dân't. n. s. A person trusted with private affairs. Abulnot.
 § This word, very unlike most others from the same source, has been made to alter its French orthography, in order to approach a little nearer to the English pronunciation of it. Some affected speakers on the stage pronounce the first syllable like cône, as it is marked in the first edition of Mr. Sheridan's dictionary; and this is perfectly of a piece with the affectation which has altered the spelling of the last. By Dryden and South, as quoted by Dr. Johnson, we find this word spelled like the adjective confident; and it is more than probable that its French pronunciation is but of late date; but, as universal is its use at present, that a g water mark of rusticity cannot be given than to place the accent on the first syllable, and to pronounce the 1st den't instead of dant. W.

To CONFIDE §, kôn-fîde'. v. n. [confido, Lat.] To trust in. Congreve.
To CONFIDE*, kôn-fîde'. v. a. To trust. Lyttelton.
CONFIDENCE, kôn-fê-dense. n. s. Firm belief; reliance. South. Security; opposed to timidity. Shak. Vicious boldness; opposed to modesty. Hooker. Consciousness of innocence; honest boldness. 1 John.
CONFIDENT, kôn-fê-dent. a. Assured beyond doubt. Hammond. Positive; dogmatical. Secure of success. Sidney. Without suspicion; trusting without limits. Shak. Bold, to a vice; impudent.
CONFIDENT, kôn-fê-dent. [See CONFIDENT.] n. s. One trusted with secrets. South.
CONFIDENTIAL*, kôn-fê-dent'-shâl. a. Spoken or written in confidence. Lord Chesterfield.
CONFIDENTIALLY, kôn-fê-dent'-shâl-lê. ad. In a confidential manner.
CONFIDENTLY, kôn-fê-dent-lê. a. Without doubt or fear of miscarriage. Shak. With firm trust. Dryden. Without appearance of doubt; positively. St. Luke.
CONFIDENTNESS, kôn-fê-dent-nês. n. s. Favourable opinion of one's own powers; assurance. Dict.
CONFIDUR*, kôn-fî-dûr. n. s. One who trusts. W. Mountagu.
To CONFIGURATE §*, kôn-fîg'-û-râte. v. n. [con and figura, Lat.] To show like the aspects of the planets towards each other. Jordan.
CONFIGURATION, kôn-fîg'-û-râ'-shûn. n. s. The form of the various parts of any thing, as they are adapted to each other. Glanville. The face of the horoscope, according to the aspects of the planets towards each other at any time. Brown.
To CONFIGURE, kôn-fîg'-ûre. v. a. To dispose into any form. Bentley.
CONFINABLE*, kôn-fîne'-â-bl. a. That which may be limited. Bp. Hall.
CONFINE §, kôn-fîne. 140, 492. n. s. [confinis, Lat.] Common boundary; border; edge. Shakespeare.
Dr. Johnson tells us, that the substantive confine was formerly pronounced with the accent on the last syllable. The examples, however, which he gives us from the poets, prove only that it was accented both ways. But, indeed, it is highly probable that this was the case; for instances are numerous of the propensity of latter pronunciation to place the accent higher than formerly; and when, by this accentuation, a noun is distinguished from a verb, it is supposed to have its use.—See Bowls. W.
CONFINE, kôn-fîne. a. Bordering upon.
To CONFINE, kôn-fîne'. v. n. To border upon. Mil.
To CONFINE, kôn-fîne'. v. a. To bound; to limit. To shut up; to imprison. Shak. To restrain; to tie up to. Brown.

CONFINEMENT, kôn-fîne'-mênt. n. s. Imprisonment; restraint of liberty. Dryden.
CONFINER, kôn-fî-nûr. n. s. A borderer. Shak. A near neighbour. Wotton. One which touches upon two different regions. Bacon. That which restrains liberty. Whilock.
CONFINITY, kôn-fîn'-ê-tê. n. s. Nearness; neighbourhood. Dict.
To CONFIRM §, kôn-fêrm'. 108. n. a. [confirmo, Lat.] To put past doubt by new evidence. 1 Cor. To settle; to establish. 1 Macc. To fix; to radicate. Wiseman. To complete; to perfect. Shak. To strengthen by new solemnities or ties. Swift. To strengthen in resolution. Milton. To admit to the full privileges of a Christian, by imposition of hands. Hammond.
CONFIRMABLE, kôn-fêrm'-mâ-bl. a. Capable of incontestable evidence. Brown.
CONFIRMATION, kôn-fêrm'-mâ-shûn. n. s. The act of establishing; settlement. Shak. Evidence; additional proof. Shak. Proof; convincing testimony. Brown. An ecclesiastical rite. Hammond.

CONFIRMATOR, kôn-fêrm'-mâ-tûr. n. s. An attester; that puts a matter past doubt. Brown.
CONFIRMATORY, kôn-fêrm'-â-tûr-ê. 512. [See

DOMESTICK.] a. Giving additional testimony. Bp Barlow. Relating to the rite of confirmation. Bp Compton.
CONFIRMEDNESS, kôn-fêrm'-êd-nês. n. s. Confirmed state. Decay of Piety.
Dr. This word ought to be added to those taken notice of Principles No. 365. W.
CONFIRMER, kôn-fêrm'-âr. n. s. One that confirms, or produces evidence or strength. Shak.
CONFIRMINGLY*, kôn-fêrm'-îng-lê. ad. In a corroborative manner. B. Jonson.
CONFISCABLE, kôn-fîs'-kâ-bl. a. Liable to forfeiture.
To CONFISCATE §, kôn-fîs'-kâte. v. a. [confiscare, from fiscus.] To transfer private property to the prince or publick, by way of penalty for an offence. Bacon.
CONFISCATE, kôn-fîs'-kâte. a. Transferred to the publick as forfeit. Shakespeare.
Dr. Kenrick blames Dr. Johnson for accenting this word on the second syllable, when the example he brings from Shakespeare accents it on the first; but it may be observed, that, as the verb ought to have the accent on the second syllable, the adjective, which is derived from it, ought to have the accent on the same syllable likewise; and the example from Shakespeare must be looked upon as a poetical license. W.
CONFISCATION, kôn-fîs'-kâ'-shûn. n. s. Transferring the forfeited goods of criminals to publick use. Ezra.
CONFISCATOR*, kôn-fîs'-kâ-tûr. n. s. One who is concerned in confiscated property. Burke.

To CONTE'MPLATE, kôn-têm-plâte. v. a. [contemplor, Lat.] To consider with continued attention; to study. Watts.

✂ There is a very prevailing propensity to pronounce this word with the accent on the first syllable; a propensity which ought to be checked by every lover of the harmony of language. That very singular analogy in our tongue, of placing the accent on the last syllable of the verb, and the first of the noun, 492, seems to have taken place chiefly for the convenience of forming participles, adverbs, and verbal nouns; which would be inharmonious and difficult to pronounce, if the verb had the accent on the first syllable. This analogy should teach us to avoid placing the accent on the first syllable of this and similar verbs, however we may pronounce nouns and adjectives; for, though to contemplate, with the accent on the first syllable, is not of very difficult pronunciation, yet contemplating and contemplatingly are almost unpronounceable. W.

Mr. Nares, in his English Orthoëpy, page 338, has

this word, where he says, "Dr. Johnson has accented

"this word on the last syllable, and has subjoined this

"remark—'anciently accented on the first.' It is evi"dent that the whole article should be reversed: the "word should stand with the accent on the first, and the remark should be—'anciently accented on the last.'" The justness of these observations will appear from the quotations:

"This is the hand which, with a vowel contra'ct,
"Was fast belock'd in thine." Shakespeare.

"I did; and his con' tract with lady Lucy,
"And his contra'ct by deputy in France." Shak.

But that the accent should now be placed on the first syllable needs no proof but the general ear, and the general analogy of dissyllable nouns and verbs of the same form. 492. W.

CONTRARILY, kôn-trâ-rî-lê. ad. In a manner contrary. In different directions. Locke.

§ This and the following word are, by Dr. Johnson, accented on the second syllable; no doubt from the harshness that must necessarily arise from placing the accent on the first, when so many unaccented syllables are to succeed. But if harmony were to take place, we should never suffer the stress on the first syllable of contrary, from which these words are formed; but that once admitted, as it invariably is by the best speakers, we should cross the most uniform analogy of our language, if we accented the adverb differently from the substantive and the adjective; and therefore, however harsh they may sound, these words must necessarily have the accent on the first syllable.—See CONTRARY. W.

CONTRARIOUS, kôn-trâ-rê-ûs. a. Repugnant the one to the other. Sir T. Elyot.

CONTRARY §, kôn-trâ-rê. a. [contrarius, Lat.] Opposite; contradictory. Davies. Inconsistent. Tillotson. Adverse; in an opposite direction. St. Matt.

§ The accent is invariably placed on the first syllable of this word by all correct speakers, and as constantly removed to the second by the illiterate and vulgar. When common ears refuse a sound, it is a strong presumption that that sound is not agreeable to the general harmony of the language. The learned often vitiate the natural taste for their own language by an affected veneration for others; while the illiterate, by a kind of vernacular instinct, fall into the most analogical pronunciation, and such as is most suitable to the general turn of the language. Anciently this word, as appears by the poets, was most commonly pronounced by the learned, as it is now by the vulgar, with the accent on the second syllable; but nothing can be now more firmly established than the accent on the first syllable, and the other pronunciation must be scrupulously avoided.—See CONTRARILY. W.

CONTRARY, kôn-trâ-rê. n.s. A thing of opposite qualities. Shak. A proposition contrary to some other. Locke.—On the contrary. In opposition; on the other side. Shak. To the contrary. To a contrary purpose. Stillingfleet.

To CONTRI'STATE ê, kôn-trîs'-tâte. v. a. [contristo, Lat.] To make sorrowful. Bacon. Ob. J.

CONTRISTA'TION, kôn-trîs-tà'-shûn. n. s. The act of making sad; heaviness of heart. Bacon. Ob. J.

CONTRITE ê, kôn-trîte. 140. a. [contritus, Lat.] Bruised; much worn. Worn with sorrow; harassed with the sense of guilt; penitent. Shakspeare.

As This word ought to have the accent on the last syllable, both as it is an adjective, from which is formed the abstract substantive contriteness, and as the accent on the first syllable has a tendency to shorten the i in the last, 140. Accordingly, Dr. Johnson, Mr. Scott, and Bailey, place the accent on the last syllable; but Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, Mr. Elphinston, Dr. Ash, W. Johnston, Perry, Buchanan, and Entick, place it on the first, with unquestionably the best usage on their side. W.

CONTRITELY †, kôn-trîte-lê. ad. Penitently.

As the adjective contrite, though contrary to analogy, seems to prefer the accent on the first syllable; contritely and contriteness must necessarily have the accent on the same syllable.—See CONTRARILY. W.

CONTRI'TENESS, kôn-trîte-nês. n. s. Contrition. Dict.

CONTRI'TION, kôn-trîsh'-ûn. n. s. The act of grinding; Penitence; sorrow for sin: in the strict sense, the sorrow which arises from the desire to please God, distinguished from attrition, or imperfect repentance produced by dread of hell. Hammond.

CONUSANCE §, kôn'-û-sânse. [See COGNIZANCE.] n. s. [connaissance, Fr.] Cognizance; notice; knowledge. A law term.

Perhaps it may be pleaded by the gentlemen of the law, that this is the word they use instead of cognizance, and, consequently, that the charge against them of mutilating that word falls to the ground. But it may be answered, that the second syllables of these words are so different as to leave us in no doubt which they make use of; and that the words cognizable, cognizor, and cognizee, being pronounced by them without the g, are sufficient proofs of the justness of the accusation. W.

In the first edition of this [Walker's] Dictionary I followed Mr. Sheridan's accentuation of this word upon the first syllable, as I apprehended it was more agreeable to polite usage, though less agreeable to the ear than the accent on the second; but, from a farther inquiry, and a review of the authorities for both, I am strongly persuaded in favour of the latter accentuation. For the former we have Sheridan, Ash, W. Johnston, and Entick; and for the latter Dr. Johnson, Kenrick, Nares, Scott, Perry, Buchanan, and Bailey. The other accentuation seems chiefly adopted by the poets, who should not be deprived of their privilege of altering the accents of some words to accommodate them to the verse:

"For 'twere a sin to rob them of their mite."—Pope.

CONVE'RSANT, kôn'-vêr-sânt, or kôn-vêr'-sânt. a. Acquainted with. Hooker. Having intercourse with; acquainted. Joshua. Relating to; concerning. Hooker.

There are such considerable authorities for each of these pronunciations as render a decision on that ground somewhat difficult. Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, and Bailey, place the accent on the second syllable; and Mr. Nares, W. Johnston, and Entick, accent the first. Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Scott place it on both, and consequently leave it undecided. Analogy seems to demand the stress on the second syllable; perhaps not so much from the relation the word bears to the verb to converse,—since it may possibly be derived from the noun converse, 492,—as from the very general rule of accenting words of three syllables, that are not simple in our language, on the second syllable when two consonants occur in the middle. This rule, however, is frequently violated in favour of the antepenultimate accent, (the favourite accent of our language,) as in aggrandize, amnesty, character, convertile, ancestor, magistrate, protestant, &c.; and where there is but one consonant in the middle, nothing is more common than to find the accent of the dissyllable verb neglected, and the trisyllable noun adopting the antepenultimate accent. Thus the words confident, president, provident, &c., are not accented like the verbs confide, preside, &c. &c., but are considered as simple, and follow the general rule; which is, that all simple words of three syllables, with but one consonant in the middle, have the accent on the first, and that the vowel in this syllable is short. 503. Upon the whole, therefore, since authorities are so equal and analogy so precarious, usage must be the umpire; and my observation fails me if that which may be called the best usage does not decide in favour of the accent on the first syllable. W.

CONVERSE, kôn'-vêrse. 492. n. s. Conversation. Swift. Acquaintance; familiarity. Glanville. [In geometry.] A proposition is said to be the converse of another, when, after drawing a conclusion from something first proposed, we proceed to suppose what had been before concluded, and to draw from it what had been supposed. Chambers.

It is highly probable that this substantive was anciently pronounced like the verb, with the accent on the second syllable; but nothing is now better established than the accent on the first. Even the line of Pope,

"Generous converse; a soul exempt from pride—"

butnot. Any thg that comforts, and exhilarates. Spenser.

There is certainly a tendency in the d, as well as in the t, to slide into a soft, hissing sound, when preceded by the accent, and followed by a diphthong or a diphthongal vowel, commencing with the sound of e. This is evident by the current pronunciation of immediate, verdure, &c., as if written immejeate, verjure, &c. 294: and this pronunciation is so agreeable to the genius of our language, that the organs slide into it insensibly. Mr. Sheridan, in order to mark this sound, has adopted the y, and spelled the word cor-dy-al: and if y is here articulated as a consonant, as is intended, its connexion with d produces a sound so near the hiss in cor-je-al, as to be with difficulty distinguished from it. W.

† Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Ash, W. Johnston, Buchanan, Entick, and Smith, accent this word on the first, and Dr. Kenrick, Scott, Perry, and Bailey, on the second syllable. The weight of authority is certainly for the accentuation I have adopted, and analogy seems to confirm this authority. For as the word is derived from corollarium, with the accent on the antepenultimate, our pronunciation of this word generally lays an additional accent on the first syllable, which, when the word is shortened by dropping a syllable in corollary, becomes the principal accent, as in a thousand other instances.—See ACADEMY. W.

Some affected speakers have done all in their power to remove the accent of this word from the second to the first syllable. Thanks to the difficulty of pronouncing it in this manner; they have not yet effected their purpose. Those who have the least regard for the sound of their language, ought to resist this novelty with all their might; for if it once gain ground, it is sure to triumph. The difficulty of pronouncing it, and the ill sound it produces, will recommend it to the fashionable world, who are as proud to distinguish themselves by an oddity in language as in dress.—See INCOMPARABLE. W.

[F] In the pronunciation of this word and its compounds Mr. Sheridan has adopted a vulgarism, of which one could scarcely have suspected him: but pronouncing covetshus for covetous is not only a vulgarism, but contrary to analogy. All those diphthongs and diphthongal vowels, which draw the preceding consonants to aspiration, are such as commence with the sound of e; which, from its nearness to the sound of double e, and the nearness of this sound to the commencing sound of y, approaches to the hissing sound of s, z, and soft c, and, in the absence of accent, coalesces with them. T and d, being formed in the same seat of sound as the s, z, and soft c, when the accent is before them, easily slide into the same sound before similar vowels, but never before any other: for we might, with as much propriety, pronounce calamitous and necessitous, calamitshus and necessitshus, as covetous, covetshus 459. W.

CRAVA/T, krâ/-vâ/-t. n. s. [cravate, Fr.] A neckcloth; any thing worn about the neck. Hudibras.

Dr. Johnson tells us this word is of uncertain etymology. It is certain, however, that it comes from the French; and Menage tells us it arose among them from the Croats, who, being in alliance with France against the emperor, came to Paris, and were remarked for the linen they wore about their necks. This soon became a fashion, and was called after the original wearers, croat, which, by a small alteration, became cravat. This word is sometimes, but improperly, pronounced with the accent on the first syllable. This pronunciation is adopted only by Dr. Ash and Buchanan, while Dr. Johnson, Mr. Elphinstone, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Kenrick, Entick, and Bailey, are uniformly for the accent on the last syllable. W.
